success with which berries were grown The secret is rich soil and abundant irrigation. The water that nature had failed to supply by rains was brought to the fields in ditches from mountain streams or secured from artesian wells.

The very biggest and best berries are often fund where the plants grow wild with their roots imbedded in soil that is almost half composed of leaf mould or other decaying vegetation. Humus makes the soil light and spongy, so that the air and water may permeate it. A soil rich in humus, whether made so by natural or artificial means, will stay moist long after a hard and impervious one has become dry.

But the question of fertility is also of the greatest importance in producing the big berry crops which are so tauch to be desired. If one plant food can be called more important than another it is quite certain that potash 13 the one that is the most essential for fruits of any kind, and the berries are no exception. Potash gives not only vigor to the plants, but causes the fruit to grow to good size and to color up well and to be of good flavor. It is some-times called the fruit-growers' paint, and so it is, for the difference can be seen between the color of the fruits that are grown where potash is abundant in available forms and where it is not. A few soils have potash in avail-able form naturally and sufficiently, but in most places it is not present in sufficient quantities, although there may be inexhaustible stores of it they are largely in unavailable forms. In such cases the application of the commercial plant foods containing potash are most useful. Perhaps sulphate and muriate of potash are the two most serviceable forms in which it is sold. Frequent and thorough tillage materally assists by causing some of the latent potash in the soil to change into available forms.

Phosphoric acid is another important plant food for fruits. It is in the soil naturally, but, like potash, is mostly in combination with other minerals that cause it to be unavailable, except in small quantities. It is in the bones of all animals, and that is why the different preparations of bone are so good for manure. In some places the bones of prehistoric animals have been deposited in great beds and often combined with minerals. These are mixed and prepared for sale as acid phosphate rock, etc., and are all good for enriching the soll.

Nitrogen, the third of the three im-portant plant foods, is so stimulating in

PROBATE AND GUARDIANSHIP NOTICES.

Interstein Soft autor and an abundant supply by rains was brought failed to supply by rains was brought to the fields in ditches from mountain streams or secured from artesian wells.
Whatever the location, there must be an abundant supply of water to make sure of a good berry crop. Water is positively required to dissolve the plant foods in the soil.
Humus has a great deal to do with the ability of the soil to retain moisture, and it often contains plant food in most excellent form. Suitable manure in moderate quantities, where the soil is not naturally well filed with humus, will supply this important element of success. Crops of clover or cowpeas ploughed under will do it also. The very biggest and best berries are to a suitable ment of success.

Nitrogen, the third of the three im-portant plant foods, is so stimulating in its effect upon vegetation, causing a succulent, leafy growth, that it must be used with much care and modera-tion on fruit. Nitrate of soda is its most soluble commercial form. Dri¹d blood is also an important nitrogen fertilizer. Both are good when needed, but the proportions required for fruit are small compared with potash and phosphoric acid. The main points in growing big ber-ry crops, to sum up the matter, are, to select a light, friable soil, to see that it is full of humus, enrich it with plen-ty of potash and phosphoric acid and use only a little nitrogen. Plant and cultivate in the most thorough man-ner. Mulching in the late fall with straw or any coarse material that is

HOW BIG BERRY

Everyone who has experience in growing berries knows that the crops that are grown at the least expense per quart are those that yield the greatest income per acre if the crop itself is of good quality. It does not pay to grow poor berry crops, yet sometimes the seasons are unfavorable and t is impossible to produce good crops even with wise provision and the best of care.

so much as to the climate as for raspberries, because the former will grow and bring fair returns in nearly every part of the country, if properly cared for, while the latter are restricted to the central and northern states.
