"NICE SWEET PORK"

SOME TELLING FACTS REGARDING ITS HEALTHFULNESS.

SALT LAKE CITY, October 26th, 1886.

Editor Deseret News:

With much interest, I have read the "Health Hints" in your columns, and am fully assured that, were they put in practice, the result would be to decrease sickness and the death rate, and to improve the physical, intellectual, and moral condition of the people.

In the EVENING NEWS of the 16th inst., I noticed some remarks upon pork eating as a source of diphtheria, and I then determined to give you the result of my

OBSERVATIONS UPON 100 HOGS, which I saw opened last winter in various parts of this city. The young, small, lean hogs were the most healthy, though one of these, weighing 15 pounds had a highly degenerated liver. This organ was of the dull brown instead of the blended glossy blue brown and red color; its substance had lost its natural firmness, and with a fork was easily broken up into a mushy mass. In plain English, that liver was in a semi-rotten state.

Another animal weighing about 400 pounds, had a liver of this character, only it was much more putrescent, a very slight pressure of the finger penetrating it, while gentle agitation with a stick would reduce it to a soft mass. It was absolutely rotten. The lungs of this brute were congested, while two large spots were very dark red, bloody and decomposed. The intestines were also very dark in color, and would break on the slightest pressure, showing marked degeneration of their substance.

Another large hog, looking sleek and healthy, had been kept in a clean pen, and, as the good folks said, was fed on "nice clean food," which, by the way, is exceptional in feeding hogs. With not the least suspicion of anything wrong, in its external appearance, this animal, when opened, showed that to the size of a small fist; yet they said, the liver was "good" (?) and doubtless it made several "fries" for the family.

Still another large hog had a number of white, opaque, cheesy looking lumps imbedded in the substance of the lungs and the breathing was laborious and heavy. This was a case of tubercular consumption of the lungs, while the liver and intestines were diseased. Many other animals had ulcers of various sizes developed in the substance of the liver. In some cases the owners said it was only necessary to "cut out the bad spots"—the ulcerations—in order to render the remainder "good to eat."

Though I have specified but a few cases, of the 100 hogs, yet nearly all suffered from either congestion, wasting or tubercular condition of the lungs, or from ulceration and degeneration of the liver, or degeneration of the intestines, and one hog had a marked inflammation of the bladder. The cases of were the most numerous. All of these hogs were used for food, and the people prided themselves upon eating nothing but the "home-raised" article.

The general supposition is that, although the vital organs may be diseased, the flesh is sweet and healthful. This is a great mistake. The whole mass of the blood passes through the liver and lungs, for its purification, and the matters composing the ulcers and tubercles are filtered out from the vital fluid and deposited in those regions. The vital organs are corrupt because the whole mass of the blood is corrupt. The flesh is made up from this diseased blood, and by means of the millions of infinitesimal blood vessels which permeate every part of the body, blood largely comprises the bulk of animal food. As evidence of this, see how the red fluid flows from the rare cooked roast and steak. In this blood the tubercular, ulcerous, and scrofulous matter exist, and the muscular fibre—the flesh proper—largely partakes of the gross and

DISEASED CHARACTER OF THE BLOOD.

It would not be difficult to show how rheumatism, "liver complaint," typhoid fever, inflammations, sore throat including diphtheria, and eruptive diseases, or scarlatina and smallpox, result from taking the above named particles into the system, in the form of pork, ham, lard, sausage, etc. But I must close for the present.

Respectfully,
HYGEO.

—The acreage of fall wheat in Cache County already sown is much larger than ever before. A great deal of the wheat is up and looks unusually promising.

WHENEVER and wherever an honest article of high merit has been produced in Utah, this establishment has invariably given it that preference, encouragement and opportunity, without which, no Home product, however meritorious, can achieve success. We have followed this principle for seventeen years, and have not yet seen the slightest cause to abandon or modify it, and it is our earliest belief that every Merchant of high principle, who values the true interest of the people whose patronage he seeks, will accept this view.

We endorse, believe in and recommend the SOAPS made in Utah, as the best articles in that line that we carry, and will pay freight both ways and all other damages when dissatisfaction occurs.
