Some years ago a plan was suggested by one of our horticulturists by which we could have obtained temporary if not permanent relief from these ravages. But the plan, although feasible, could not be carried out without concerted action its was to grow no apples or pears for one season, to destroy the blossoms of the trees; this would have ended the generations of the worst form of apple worm, the codling moth. Such an extreme measure was deemed impracticable, but other methods were recommended, some of which may be sgain mentioned. This troublesome pest may
