HACKNEY IN HAL.

Sharp Shot at a Spirited American Bred Hackney Filly.

Our artist has here caught one of the handsomest young horse bred hackneys reares in America. At the time this picture was taken she was a 3 year-old filly, as full of fun and life as any member of her sex of the human species.

HACKNEY FILLY.

The sire of this mare was imported Glendale of the Indian Neck stock farm, Long Island. Her dam was Heal Kit, by Reality.

So promising was this fine animal from the first that when she was 10 months old a western man who appreciated her points offered $2,000 for her, an unusual price for the best bred fillies at that period of their existence. Her owner, however, refused this large sum for her. She is noted for her grace of motion and high spirit, as well as her wonderful action in harness. She holds her head up like a queen.

About Wool.

Following is a summary of the report on wool by experts of the United States bureau of statistics:

That no commercial and industrial nation is self sufficient as to its supply of wool or ever has been since machinery was first employed in the manufacture of woolens.

That the sheep growing industry is subject to the same fluctuations of prosperity and depression that affect every other industry.

That neither wool growing nor wool manufacturing is a local industry unless shut in by artificial restrictions on the free movement of exchange of the raw wool or manufactured products.

That such restrictions are easily placed upon the raw wool, but are generally upon the manufactured products. No other nation of commercial and industrial importance imposes so high duties on wool and woolens as the United States.

That no legislation, short of prohibition of foreign competition, has availed to maintain prices in the face of the rapid increase in the world's supply.

That prices of domestic and imported woolen have ruled higher in the last 10 years in the United States than elsewhere, but this has not proved of advantage to either woolgrower or manufacturer of woolens.

That the present depression is as marked in Europe, Asia and Australasia as in the United States, and cannot therefore be due to any local factor or condition applying only to the United States.

That foreign nations possessing wool manufacturing industries gain by a free choice of wools in a free market.

That the experience of European nations would show that O[illegible] try of English wool has not [illegible]ped their sheep raising industries; that no outside competition has or can completely destroy it, or even injure it in the long run, where reasonable effort is made to maintain quality of clip.

That the shifting of wool producing centers—meaning by the center the country of wool production dominating the commercial markets—is inevitable and cannot be staid or prevented by legislation.

That wool raising is controlled by the same economic conditions as any other industry, agricultural, industrial or commercial. It is extended when profitable and contracted when depressed. It is not contracted to suit manufacturers, but manufacturers conform to it, changing methods and machinery to follow the wool product.

To tell our own secrets is generally folly, but that folly is without guilt. To communicate those which we obtain by an intrusion is always treachery, and treachery for the most part combined with folly.—Johnson.

Our Food in Europe.

The best dairy cows in Europe are fed largely on roots—Jerseys and Guernseys on parsnips, and those of the regions of the Baltic, whence come the Dutch and Holstein cattle, are largely fed on the beet. This succulent food fed to the dam while bearing her young not only makes the new given milk, but impresses that tendency on her unborn progeny. This is the reason why a milking strain of cows in the hands of a poor feeder and manager will so soon degenerate into scrubs. If pinched by cold and lack of food in winter, or fed on dry, fattening food at that time, a cow cannot keep up to her best.
