DESTRUCTION WROUGHT

BY FLOODS. According to the geographical sur-vey, floods cost the people of the United States $100,000,000 a year. The mere menace of these floods prevents the development of thousands of squar-niles of otherwise valuable property and limits the usefulness of a far greater area, while the torrents them-selves each year oblicerate communs miles of otherwise valuable property and limits the usefulness of a far greater area, while the torrents them-selves each year obliterate enomous values and bring to naught the toil-some work of many people. A great flood is, above all things, a source of waste-as a rule, of needless waste-Some of the elements of this waste-the damage to property, trade and pub-lic comfort-are familiar, forcing them-selves into recognition with every re-currence of flood stages by the inter-ruption of business and the immense expenditures required to restore nor-mal conditions; but other elements are unfamiliar or remain quite forgotten. The greatest item of loss connected with floods, that which is the farthest reaching and of the widest scope, is the waste of water itself. A very con-servative estimate of the value of this water places it at five times that of the more tangible results of flood damage. That is, every gallon of this wasted water is needed urgently to augment the flow of the streams in times of drouthe. If the flood water of the streams of the United States could be stored for the future use, it would be worth to the people of the country $560,000,000, annually. the damage to property, trade and pub.
