EVENING NEWS.

NEWS NOTES.

Why is the Brooklyn trial court-room like the kingdom of heaven? Because "many shall strive to enter in, but shall not be able."

The Viceroy of Egypt's eldest daughter is a lovely woman. "One can quite understand," says a writer, "how even a Frenchman could have risked his neck to see and speak to her."

Thomas Carr was fined in an English court eleven shillings sterling for having exposed in the market for sale twenty hens and a cock in a basket eighteen inches square and scarcely a foot deep.

Zach Chandler says, just as if the country wasn't scourged enough with potatoe-bugs, grasshoppers, buffalo-gnats and conflagrations, that old Bristow is making a fool of himself by trying to get up a whiskey famine.

The marriage of a priest has been decided to be legal by an Italian court. This decision strikes at the root of those Church regulations which have been interwoven with the whole fabric of Italian laws and customs.

There are so many catastrophes occurring just now which furnish grounds for appeals to the charitable, that all truly good men are exchanging their ready cash for United States securities.—Brooklyn Argus.

The manufacture of caoutchouc from milk weed (asclepias) has been undertaken by a company in Canada with a capital of $100,000. The milky juice yields about four per cent. of caoutchouc.

In a couple of months Sheridan will be astonished to hear—"You may be lieutenant general of the United States, Philip; but that don't signify that you can run this establishment."—Rochester Democrat.

Fire was lately discovered in a berth on a steamboat in England, which had originated in the heat of the sun—one of the glass "deadlights" concentrating the rays directly on the spot and acting as a burning-glass. How many vessels at sea may have been fired in that way?

As some difficulty existed in getting a good supply of properly qualified carpenters for the English navy, the shipwright apprentices at Chatham dockyard in the last two years of their service were invited to volunteer. The regulations of the royal navy are so distasteful that not a single apprentice has responded to the invitation.

Nebauer has discovered an important eleventh century manuscript of the Psalms, in possession of a rabbi at Jerusalem, which he says, has important variations from the accepted text, and he thinks the commission to revise the English version ought to send out agents to hunt up some more old manuscripts before its work can be accepted.

This is the way the young men of Farmington come back on the young ladies who resolved not to countenance the use of tobacco by associating with those addicted to the habit. Resolved, that hereafter we will not associate with or countenance any female who wears false hair or false teeth (under twenty years of age) or who uses corsets or paints, and who allows her trail to draggle in the streets.

It is believed in Russia that the Grand Countess Marie leads a life of daily martyrdom with her British husband, the Duke of Edinburgh, and the heart of every son of Muscovy burns in listening to the gossip current about the ill treatment which the daughter of the Czar receives at home and the discourtesy shown to her abroad. These rumors are talked of in all circles and are accepted by the common people as unquestionable truth.

What is the Best Lightning Rod?

A commission appointed by the French Government to consider this subject, concludes that square iron rods fifty-nine hundredths of an inch square, and several hundred feet in length, are perfectly competent to convey lightning discharges of the usual nature to the ground; and that copper conductors of the same section are still better than iron, on account of the superior conducting power of copper. A copper rod through which is discharged a large battery of Leyden jars, which are charged to their utmost capacity, can be held in the hand while the discharge leaps to it and then passes through it to the ground. The body in this case is a poor conductor compared with the rod, and remains unaffected, like the building which is thoroughly protected by a lightning rod. Having decided upon the size of our rod, questions arise as to its insulation. To speak in general terms, the better the insulation the better the protection. Glass insulators of any form are sufficient. Even the wood of the house itself is sometimes used; but this insulation can not be depended on. The point most often overlooked is a proper connection with the various bell-ropes and metallic pipes which run through our buildings, and with other metallic masses. The lightning-flash descending the lightning rod often chooses to leap to some neighboring pipe or wire, through intervening partitions of wood or stone, before it seeks the ground.

Supposing that our lightning conductor is of sufficient section, and is connected with all outlying metallic masses of large extent, how many projecting rods should we have, and how high should they rise above the highest point in the building? It is recommended by the French Commission which we have already quoted, and also by a commission appointed by the United States government to inquire into the protection of powder magazines, "that the height of the point of a lightning-rod above the highest point of a building to be protected should be from nine and eight-tenths feet to sixteen and four-tenths, according to circumstances, and that it is almost always better to increase the number of the rods, keeping within these limits, and to join them all together by a common conductor, than to increase the height of any one point." In reference to the best connection of lightning rods with the ground, the opinion is unanimous that the termination should be in moist ground, or with a system of water-pipes. It is necessary to reach what is called the subterranean sheet of water—that is, the supplier of the various watercourses, wells, and springs; in short, the vast area of good conducting earth, beneath sandy and rocky tracts, which are poor conductors.—Atlantic Monthly.
