BROADCLOTH COSTUME WITH TUNIC SKIRT.

So much of the interest in present day costumes is centered in the skirt that one hails with positive delight a model which is entirely new. Among the newest of skirts are those which show the tunic drapery. In the make-up of these new overskirts, for that is what they are, they are a suggestion more than a reality for the overskirt is only a part of the remainder of the skirt, the fullness below being set on to the tunic somewhat in flounce style. A handsome model for this year show the tunic across front and sides only, the back of the skirt being a continuous length from belt to hem. Outlining the tunic is a trimming made of an inserted band of side plaited silk, a line of machine stitching running through the center of this band to hold the plaits secure. This is a most novel and yet effective trimming and its use is noted again on the coat bodice, where it outlines a sort of yoke on the front and sides, simulating as it were, a bolero. Narrow plaits of the same silk trim the sleeves. The drop skirt and lining of the costume is of the same silk which is a changeable foulard, the gown being a pokeberry red and the silk a changeable red and grey. Around the bottom of the skirt there are series of cordings which give body and add stiffness to the hem.

only in our own country, but in Europe as well. Although, so far as I know, nothing has been attempted in Italy as yet, I am writing to ask whether you could not bring within your sphere of influence one most crying abuse—the case of the boys in the Cielian sulphur mines. My own work is with the Latin language, and doubtless my general interest in Italian conditions has impressed it more deeply on my mind, but it has long seemed to me quite the most shocking form of child labor of which I know. As I understand it, the parents of these boys, when they are 10 years old, practically sell them to the mine operators, receiving a sum which the boys have to work out before they are free. It is said that less than half the boys live to do it. The work is entirely hard, and the conditions constitute the worst type of slavery, since their masters have no interest in preserving their health and strength except to make them work out their price. It is said that boys who have run away have been whipped to death as a warning to the rest. It is said, and not by the over-sentimental either, that to see those children climbing ladders with tears rolling down their cheeks is a sight hard to forget.

The writer quotes Prof. Rufus Richardson, formerly director of the American school at Rome, who told of and described this sad state of things in a recent lecture on Sicily. She asks that the General Federation be asked to send a petition to the king and a son of Italy, begging them to ameliorate the condition of the children.

Every woman's heart must shrink before such a shocking state of barbarism, but if the General Federation should send a petition to the king and queen, and the Italian women should reply with a petition to President Roosevelt in half of the child slaves in the Georgia cotton mills and the New Jersey glass factories, what then? There is a very large beam in our own eye in the matter of child labor. Down in Georgia, after most strenuous efforts, the lower house of the legislature has passed a bill protecting children under 12, provided that their labor is not needed for the support of a widowed mother or a sick father. This bill may not, probably will not, become a law, for the state seems determined to build up a textile industry whether any of its children live to grow up or not. Thousands of good citizens, fathers of families, church members, meet every argument among the rank and file of workmen that the enfranchisement of women means chiefly prohibition. Their experience has never convinced them that the friends of enfranchisement are the friends of the wage-earners today. They do not act from abstract considerations. They reason and act and vote, largely upon their daily experience. Now, since suffragists are promoting legislation on behalf of the children, it appears to be possible at once, both protecting the young breadwinners who are the future republic and at the same time winning for the cause of enfranchisement the large and important bodies of voters in those centers in which our cause has hitherto suffered most severely.
