

Leaves Congress To Rule a Great City.

After eight years of useful, even distinguished, service in the house of representatives, George Brinton McClellan yesterday departed thence to become chief executive of America's greatest city. As a Democrat, and with the Democrats in the minority, there was not much power and no very great responsibility attached to his position as a representative in Congress, says the Washington Post. As mayor of greater New York he will have power and responsibilities second only to those possessed and borne by the president of the United States.

McClellan is now to take up such a burden of administrative work, one of the youngest mayors New York ever had. Since his election last November he has celebrated his thirty-third birthday.

But even if there are those who harbor doubts as to the success of his administration, the doubts have not their foundation in his lack of years. Ten years ago he was elected president of the New York board of aldermen, a position familiarly referred to as vice mayor. Since then he has been an active participant in public affairs, and that knowledge of men and matters that is only to be gained in the school of experience.

The son of a distinguished father, whose name he bears, young McClellan, nevertheless, has in a large measure been the architect of his own fortunes. If he has been helped to some extent by the fact that he is a son of the famous Union general, in other respects the fact has proved a handicap, so that the scales are about evenly balanced.

After his defeat for the presidency by Abraham Lincoln in 1864, Gen. George B. McClellan went abroad, and at Dresden, in Saxony, in 1865, the son was born. The family continued to reside abroad, and young McClellan received his early education in the best schools of Europe. His foreign tutors grounded him well in the rudiments of education, and, in addition, he became a linguist of marked ability. Upon returning to the United States he entered Princeton and was graduated from that venerable institution of learning. Later he studied law and was admitted to the bar.

Young McClellan must have inherited some of his father's great genius for organization and leadership. He has never been content to follow the lead of others. At Princeton he played ball and was captain of the team.

Equipped with a splendid education, highly endowed with the goods of the world, McClellan was early thrown on his own resources. He began his life in New York as a reporter on the staff of the old New York Morning Journal. Later he was financial editor of the Herald and he early interested himself in the politics of the city.

A Democrat by inheritance and teaching, McClellan found that in New York Tammany stood for the Democratic party. He forthwith became a Tammany man, and has never asked more than that his fortunes should rise or fall with the fortunes of the Wigwam. About the time McClellan began to interest himself in politics, Richard Croker was coming into power in Tammany. It always was the policy of Croker to encourage young men in politics, and the personality of McClellan especially appealed to him. No doubt the wily Croker also figured that the son of a great soldier and a great Democrat would be useful in his business. He gave Mr. McClellan his first office, the treasurership of the Brooklyn bridge.

In 1892 Tammany wanted to elect Thomas F. Gilroy mayor of New York, and it was imperatively necessary that the nominee for president of the board of aldermen, the second place on the ticket, should be a man who would appeal to the better class of voters. After a careful survey of the field, McClellan was selected. The ticket was elected, and McClellan, at the age of 27, became vice mayor of New York. Mayor Gilroy frequently was absent from the city, and so often was McClellan called upon to discharge the duties of his chief that he came to be called the "boy mayor."

Croker was vastly pleased with his young protégé, and Tammany was proud of him. The men who rule Tammany, as a general thing, have been busy "getting there" to acquire classical educations, and they lack the polish that comes from intercourse with cultivated society. McClellan gave an air of respectability to the organization that without him it might have lacked. Whenever there was public speaking to do, or when Tammany needed a representative to step out for the world to look upon, McClellan was put forward. The thing that Tammany liked best about him, however, was his thorough Democracy. His birth and social position did not prevent his being one of the boys. If McClellan considered himself better than the average Tammany worker he kept the secret locked closely in his breast. Otherwise he would not have lasted long in Tammany.

Along about the time of his election as vice mayor, McClellan moved into the Eighteenth assembly district, of New York City. The Tammany leader in the Eighteenth district was a bright young Irishman, named Charlie Murphy. He had been denied the privilege of an education, and had started his political career as the keeper of a small saloon. He soon had several saloons. The profits he invested in real estate and the stock market, and one day he awoke to the realization that he was rich. Then he sold the saloons.

Dissimilar as had been their environments in life, there sprang up between the young president of the board of aldermen and the young leader of the Eighteenth district a warm friendship, based on mutual liking and esteem, that has continued unbroken to this day. Murphy became convinced that McClellan was a man of destiny, and has urged him upon Tammany for about every high office that organization had within the possibility of its gift.

In 1898, and again in 1900, he wanted McClellan nominated for governor, and in 1901 urged Croker to make him Tammany's candidate for mayor. Croker was inclined to listen to Murphy's reasoning, but felt that he did not dare nominate a recognized Tammany man. He nominated Judge Shepley instead, and Tammany met one of the worst defeats of its career.

It was in 1894 that McClellan had become disgruntled at Bourke Cockran, and determined to defeat him for the nomination. He picked McClellan to succeed him. David B. Hill, who, as governor, had made McClellan a colonel on his staff, tried to save Cockran by keeping McClellan out of the race, but McClellan could not take a view of the situation that agreed with Hill's. So he made the fight and won.

Murphy believes his friend is fitted for the highest place, and it is his dearest ambition to see McClellan nominated and elected to the presidency. He would like to accomplish the result next year, and may make the effort, but chiefly he is looking forward to 1908.

Socially, Mayor McClellan's administration undoubtedly will be a brilliant one. Ten years ago he married Miss Georgianna Hecksher, the daughter of an old New York family that always has been prominent in society.

Both have all the accomplishments for a successful social career, and in Washington they have been much entertained in the most exclusive homes. For several years past their Washington home has been at the Shoreham.

Mr. McClellan had great personal popularity in both houses of Congress, and on both the Democratic and Republican sides. Although not an orator in the ordinary acceptance of the term, he always had attention when he talked, because he only talked when he had something worth while to say.

Special Interviews With Our Greatest Men

COVERING THE NEW FIELDS OF CAPITAL AND LABOR, BUSINESS AND TRADE, SCIENCE AND INVENTION, POLITICS AND MONEY-MAKING, Beginning with

A SPECIAL INVESTIGATION OF THE NEW RELATIONS OF CAPITAL AND LABOR.

The Situation.

The United States is now a new country with new men and new issues. It is a land of organized capital. We have 850 industrial combinations which command $15,000,000,000. We have 213 industrial trusts capitalized at $7,000,000,000 and about 5,000 other corporations. These trusts are swallowing small businesses. They have bound the hands of industry with trade regulations. We have become a land of pool-makers, rate-fixers and profit-sharers. New questions of enormous importance stare us in the face.

At the same time Labor also is organized on a gigantic scale. We have 1,378 trade unions in one federation. They cover every trade and hope to control every wage-earner. They already have 2,000,000 members and their chiefs hold adversity and prosperity in their hands. Within the past two decades there have been 22,000 strikes, resulting in a loss of wages amounting to $257,000,000 and to the employers of $122,000,000. The strikes grow more and bigger every year and the public, as is evidenced by the anthracite strike, is ground between the upper and nether millstones of employer and employees.

Of late, new combinations are being formed by the union of organized Capital and organized Labor, both for the good and at the expense of the Public.

Where Are We To Land?

This question is on everyone's lips. It is a pocketbook question affecting prices, wages, the chance to work, the profits of capital, and in fact every man, woman and child in the country.

This investigation is undertaken to find out what the situation is and to give a broad-gauge discussion as to how it may be handled for the best good of all.

EDUCATIONAL.

L. D. S. UNIVERSITY.

School will re-open on Monday, Jan. 4. A large proportion of the students returned to their homes in various parts of the state and of surrounding states during the two weeks' vacation.

Athletics did not come to a standstill during the holidays. The basketball team played with the Fort Douglas boys and defeated them by a large score.

The students in chemistry spent three days of each week during the holidays in laboratory work. The large laboratory, fuming and steaming with various chemical experiments, was the principal sign of activity about the school buildings.

For the first time since the reorganization of the L. D. S., the chemical laboratory is in a completely satisfactory condition. It is a room about 30x60 feet in floor space, with hooks to accommodate all the students that need to work at them. The chemical desks are models of convenience. In fact none better are known. This spacious laboratory is used only for practical chemistry. It is apart from the main buildings, but only a few rods distant. The student loses no time, either in work or in travel, lacks no necessary facility.

The prize story for the Christmas issue of the Gold and Blue was written by Miss Lella Marler. It is a unique novelette, clear and felicitous in expression, with tender pathos, and a strong moral. It is entitled Eve's Journal, and is well worth preservation. Miss Marler is receiving the congratulations of her fellow-students for this choice production.

The winner of the prize for the best design of a new cover for the Gold and Blue was Student Vernon Felt, whose clever handwork in embellishing the students' paper has been so much appreciated in the past. His present drawing is a bold and simple design, with the picture of one of the laid students in the center. The sketch may be described in the words of Horace, "Bauful in simplicity."

The third of President Paul's papers on punctuation, which appears in this number, contains an exhaustive treatment of parenthetical expressions. The author divides these into four groups: parenthetical and intermediate expressions, which take commas; common explanatory expressions, which require curves, or marks of parenthesis; and dramatic explanatory expressions, which are punctuated with dashes. This treatment is unlike that found in any school books, and the rules for explanatory expressions are both original and comprehensive. These articles are eliciting much favorable comment, and many letters are received in relation to them. It is decided to send the copies of the special issue only to those who apply for them. If any who have applied do not receive the second issue next week, a request on a postal card will bring the paper.

The retail given by the students of Prof. Kent in Barratt hall last week was both an artistic and a popular success. A large audience, many of our students among the number, greeted the production. The program was a varied and interesting one. A noticeable feature was the alternation of classic and popular music in the selections. Another innovation was the dispatch with which the program was carried through. Among the many fine numbers, there was more artistic than the rendition of "Come, Thro' the Eye," by our kindergarten teacher, Miss Leona Taylor. The audience seemed to be thoroughly pleased with the program. It is the professor's intention to give another recital before long, while school is in session, so that all students may have the opportunity of attending it.

REMOVED TO THEIR HOMES.

Immediately after the accident the Bowen and Laux boys were removed to their homes, the former in a delivery wagon, the latter on an improvised stretcher. The others walked home, Miss Don with the assistance of friends. Physicians were hastily summoned and the young people's injuries properly attended to. Concerning the two most seriously injured Dr. E. V. Silver made the following statement:

"The Bowen boy is bleeding from the left ear. He is suffering from contusion of the breast and a heavy shock. What will be the outcome cannot be as yet determined, and it will take 24 hours before the crisis is past. The Laux boy is badly shocked and the left side of his face horribly lacerated. He will come out all right."

One Who Can Figure Out Combinations Badly Needed.

A man who is an expert at figuring out combinations on safes can find employment by applying to County Treasurer Carbis at once. The treasurer has a double compartment strong box which went through the Atlas black fire and was later sold to the county by the Bank of Commerce. The combinations to the box were lost, but a traveling man labored with one of the combinations and succeeded in opening it, so that now one-half of the box can be used.

The other combination, however, is not known, and the treasurer is anxious to find a man who can open it without using nitroglycerine. A number of expert safe men have tried it but only one succeeded and he did not leave the treasure and the latter does not know his name or address, hence cannot secure the coveted information.
