

SCANDAL OVER INDIAN SUPPLIES
Colorado Game Wardens Propose to Mix Up With the Army.
WHERE UTAH COMES IN ON IT

Deputy Fenn is of the Opinion that There is a Steal Aggregating $4,000 a Month.

Captain J. F. Guilfoyle, of Fort DuChesne, Utah, has started an avalanche, says the Denver News, of Friday. His unqualified assertion in the News Monday morning that there were never more than seven Indians across the Colorado line at one time during the recent raid from the Utah reservations is about to have the effect of opening an investigation of the real causes of these periodic depredations, and Game Deputy Frank Fenn is the one who intends to look into the matter. The Colorado officials believe there are hidden reasons for the audacity of the redskins that may involve persons higher in authority than the petty chiefs who will continue to hold together the remnants of their tribes.

Mr. Johnson did not come down from Loveland yesterday, but Deputy Fenn, who was one of those to accompany the commissioner on his recent trip to the scene of the threatened Indian troubles, declared that he intended to visit the Utah border within the next two or three weeks. To begin with, he wants to find out what becomes of the hides of the deer that the Utes and Thompsons kill when they make their raids upon the forests of Colorado, and incidentally he will make some inquiries about the profits received from the sales of the redskins do not get when they are off their reservations. He and Mr. Johnson are agreed that the Indian agents and the military have a commercial motive in concealing the real facts about the aborigines from the public and the authorities at Washington.

The renegade whites that consort with the Indians are largely responsible for their actions," remarked Mr. Fenn yesterday afternoon. "They are the ones who get the big end of the bargain when the hides are divided up and it is certainly strange that the agents do not know this is going on, if indeed they are as ignorant as they seem. I should like very much to have a talk with Agent Myton. I think I could express some thoughts to him that would give him a cold shiver. The hides that the Indians secure from the deer of Colorado are contraband, and I wish I could find out where they go to. If a trip to that section of the country and a talk with some of the big chiefs that can be relied upon to tell the truth will reveal anything, I think I can turn up quite an interesting scandal. The white renegades urge these tales and the Indians fall into line because that is just the kind of pleasure they enjoy. There are a great many of these white renegades along the Utah border and they have many ways of profiting by the incursions of the redskins. I cannot be sure that I will accomplish anything by a trip, but I intend to try. It is an easy matter for the authorities over there to whitewash the facts. I do not know what influence the renegades have with the government agents. There is another phase of the question that I am not quite prepared to talk on, and that is the matter of the monthly rations. They say the Indians do not get their rations when they are off of their reservations. If they are not present at the monthly distributions, they are not provided with their regular quotas of supplies, unless perhaps they in some instances leave the squaws to look after the matter. When between 400 and 500 Indians come across the border, what becomes of their rations that must be accounted for as delivered in the government reports? If what the agents say is true? I should say the monthly ration of a single Indian amounts to at least $10 worth of supplies. This means $400 for 400 Indians, and if the redskins do not get it, where does it go? I'll let some one else answer this, because I do not know. I don't suppose it would be worth my while to try to find out."

AN INCIDENT.

It was May in California. The day was warm and sultry, and the passengers of the crowded car grew more and more uncomfortable as the train sped north from Monterey. There was no drawing-room car and all sorts of conditions of men were trying to make the best of a miserable journey. Midway down the car sat a Mexican. He was perhaps forty years old, and had the superb physique of a man whose life was spent in the open air. In his arm was a baby sound asleep, and by his side an older boy with great brown eyes and yellow curls. The children's clothes were dainty, and the boy held close in his little hand a bunch of white roses. The father stared absently out of the window with an occasional glance of apprehension at the child in his arms. The afternoon wore on. The baby woke up, and with an awkward, uncustomed manner the man opened a sacker and found a bottle of milk. The baby took a little of it, and with a sudden move threw the bottle on the floor. The blood mounted to the father's face as, with a few words of apology to the people in the opposite seat, he tried to push the debris away with his foot. The boy clinging to the now faded reds said softly, "I want mamma." The father leaned over and patted his curls, then turned and gazed out of the window.

A Palo Alto undergraduate said audibly, "I should think a man would know better than to travel with two such youngsters."

The train stopped at a station. Some men came hurrying through looking pale. One, in a gruff, hearty voice, called out, "Hello, Jose, what are you doing here?" The Mexican looked up, hesitating a moment, then, as the man came close to him, said, "I buried my to-day, John, and I'm taking the children to my mother in San Francisco."
