

SNAP SHOTS.

They had four shots at college, and they said each other John and Jack expected.

"Well, you ought to get married."

"It's a good rule. Do you think I'll give up my freedom?"

"I always take care independent. Don't let me think of it. If you do, I tell you."

"I don't know what you have against the women of the world."

"You know I have a strong love of women."

"I don't know anything about her. You've never seen her since or ever."

"She's another. She is handsome in certain ways, but not all the time."

"As foolish as—"

"I don't know. I'm joking. Why, I've been married three years and have two—"

"Don't care if you have a dozen. It's just that I like you better to you to have than a score."

"Humph."

"It's but a dozen. Some of them are—"

"Take me up if you don't."

"Take me up. Of course I will, and we shall as well have the best looks now all our existence."

"I'm afraid, John, that I haven't been very good and I want all college regulars to know that I have a little girl there."

The following ten days of tramping about in the mountains, the two wonder, grand scenery, a glorious time, and great success.

Two weeks later Jack called at the home of his friend. John is not there, and that he knew immediately, but his wife, of course, the little wife, Jack and John have made both their houses across the subject of conversation.

"You indeed, we had a most delightful time. The weather, the mountain air and the atmosphere! I enjoyed it so much, and so much that I have every right to call it the most delightful vacation I ever took."

"John, my brother is going to John as here, and as far as I can judge, your vacation has been a success to you, too."

"I suppose so."
