THE ROLLER PROCESS OF MAKING FLOUR.

Only a few years ago all the flour made in this country was made on milistones; to-day milistones have gone almost entirely ont of use and by iar the larger part of the flour is made on chilled iron rolls. Almost every large merchant mill in the United States has adopted this new process and it is also rapidly finding its way In this Territory roller-mills as they are called, have as yet made but little idented them and more will have to as the superiority of the flour made by them comes to be generally appreciatnaking flour consisted in grinding the crain between millstones, rendering it s time as is desired at a single oper ion. The product, or chop, was then bolted, the flour being removed by this mean; , while the residue was sold for The disadvantages of this meth- in Paris for some time od of milling are numerous and obvious. In the first place the action of the milistone upon the brittle bran is a parsh and rasping one and must neessarily rub off innumerable fine paricles of bran, which pass through the polting cloth with the flour and cau never be separated from it, but make the bread dark in color. Then the impurities which are contained in the crease of the wheat-berry cannot be removed by any cleaning machine, and by the old system of low grinding one knows where they were."

inour. This part of the wheat being next to the bran is really the richest and most nutritous portion of front of him: "now I underst t, yet by the old milistone system t is sold with the bran for feed. The new roller system, or system of radual reduction as it is also called, acts in an entirely different manner. The wheat, after being properly cleaned, is passed to a pair of chilled iron rolls, which are suitably corrugated, and set at such a distance as to just give the wheat a light, cracking blow, plitting it through the seam. By this neans each bean is broken into two or hree pieces, and the crease dirt is released. This is called the "first break."

I'me products of this operation are, therefore, large pieces of broken wheat and a little very dark flour, made very lark by the pressure of the crease dirt. These are passed over a "scalping-reel" and a kind of sieve covered with wire-cloth, by which the dark flour is removed, and the broken wheat passes to the next set of rolls. These are corrugated a little finer and set a little loser together, and therefore break the wheat into a little smaller pieces, also setting free a little more flour and middlings. The products are again passed over a scalping reel, the flour and middlings removed and the oroken wheat sent to a third pair of roits. This operation is repeated four, five or six times, or until the wheat has all been reduced to flour, middings and clean bran—that is, bran to which no flour is adhering. The flour is sent to the bolting chests, the middings on to "middlings-partier" dings go to "middlings-purifier," where they are separated from all impurities and are then reground to flour cither on mill stones or smooth iron rolls—preferably the latter—while the clean bran is sent to the bran pile.

Perhaps the greatest advantage of roller mills over millstones is that they permit the utifization of all that is valuable in the wheat being. They do not leave any flour in the bran to be not leave any flour in the bran to be sold at the price of feed. And in this way alone they render both wheat-grower and milier very valuable service, by enabling them to get more out of their wheat than they could with mill-their wheat than they could with mill-the smooth corrugations.

Every great passion is but a prolonged hope — Feucheres.

A little fellow with a tall stalwart wife was asked by a friend if the contrast between them didn't often expose him to mortifying remarks. "Oh, i dont mind that," he said, cheerfully, "but since Sarah's grown near-sighted I have to look sharp for fear she'li step on me."
