

RARE LITHOGRAPHIC PICTURE OF GREAT SALT LAKE CITY AS IT LOOKED IN 1852.

One of the many rare pictures of Pioneer days possessed by Hon. Spencer Clawson is a lithographic production of Great Salt Lake City as it looked in 1852. The transformation that has been wrought since that time is little less than marvelous. Old timers will find the picture immensely interesting, and will be able to find some of the landmarks that exist now only in memory. Others they will not be able to detect at all. The figures indicating the principal buildings are very faint and are not easily read. However they afford opportunity for study and the entire reproduction is one that will appeal to the lover of things reminiscent.

Where the great Emery-Holmes flat now stands is marked by a corral for enclosing cattle as they were unyoked in coming home from across the plains. Where the Deseret News building stands is designated a "Council House for the People," down the sides of State street are shown the young trees, which were the first green shrubs planted to relieve the barren brown of the desert, and to give to Salt Lake the appearance of the blossoming garden in the desert to the weary emigrant, who looked down on the valley from the eastern mountains.

The cut is from an old lithograph map, found by Spencer Clawson in clearing out a store room on his premises, and by him loaned to the Deseret News. The drawing was done by W. W. Majors, very much of an amateur at the draughting business—a fact which accounts for the peculiar look of the mountains surrounding the valley. The main gorge, however, can be easily identified as Parley's canyon, and the famous Bingham canyon can be located on the west range, which is pictured as extending into the foreground from the point of the mountain, where Jordan river comes through from the south.

The artist sat to make his sketch on Arsenal hill, now known as Capitol hill, and he looked southwestward over the valley. The sketch is written in large letters, "Great Salt Lake City in 1852." Below that are numbers referring to numbers on the sketch, with written descriptions of the things referred to.

No. 1 is located at the flag pole shown in the cut. It is labeled "Temple block and flag pole." The American flag is flying from the pole, with the word "Utah" printed across it. The building shown, referred to as "the Tabernacle for the people" is the old "adobe" tabernacle, which has long since been torn down. None of the buildings now standing are shown. Those in the picture were carpenter shops which were taken down after the completion of the Temple 12 years ago. The "Bower" which was used as a meeting place in summer, was located just east of the main building shown in the cut. In this old bower, Utah's first theatrical attraction was given, Phil Morris, Bishop Hiram B. Clawson and other well known people appearing in the first performance.

No. 2 in the picture is styled "Governor Young's house." However, the house is shown only in part, the large building in the foreground, being what was known as "The Lamb Barn," as a lamb carved in stone surmounted the arched gateway, and under it ran the inscription, "Shepherds take care of your flock." The building not many years ago gave way to a more modern barn on the Jennings property, owned by Mr. Farneworth. The fence in inclosure just below the barn, facing on State street, and directly east of the flag pole, was a corral for cattle coming in off the plains. Back of it, in part view behind the barn is Governor Young's first executive mansion. It was known once as "The White House," and while it still stands on "Brigham" street, adjoining the Emery-Holmes flat, the curious fact is that it was at one time torn down by one of the predent's sons, John W. Young, and rebuilt out of the same timbers and with the same design, lot further west than where it originally stood.

A small building recognized as the "Young homestead" what used to be known as "The Smoky House," where the earliest of Utah's food supplies in most were prepared for keeping through the winter. Back of it, where now stands the residence of Gen. C. S. Burton, was the "Wood House," an important structure in the days before the advent of coal, when the principal business of the autumn was the gathering of logs in the canyons to last for fuel through the long and rigorous pioneer

Back of the Young house is what the print designates as "The Upper Garden," embracing First, Second, Third and Fourth streets, where now is located one of the most prosperous residence districts of the city.

Farther up on the hill than the garden is a section of the famous old mud wall at one time surrounding Salt Lake city, a protection from Indians.

North of the flag pole in the picture, and on the brow of the hill is what is called "Heber C. Kimball's house." The structure still stands substantially as it was then. President Elimbau lies buried in the lot near the house, while on his original holding have recently been built the Lafayette schoolhouse and the McCune residence, and several other modern structures.

Marked 5 on the map is the Deseret News office, which stands today as it did in 1852. It is labeled "Tithing Store House for the Poor." Beside this building to the east is one of the first structures built in Utah outside of the fort, where Utah's pioneers made their first camp. In this house Gov. Wells and a number of the children of President Young were born. Further to the east is shown a rear view of the Beehive House. At that time the Lion House had not been built. North of the "tithing store house" is shown the old Whitney home, built by Newell K. Whitney, who was first presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

Opposite the tithing store house, and on the premises now occupied by the Templeton building is "Benson's House." Ezra T. Benson, its builder, left soon after the sketch was made, for Cache valley. He sold his place to Gen. D. H. Wells, by whose estate it was owned until purchased by Zion's Savings bank a few years ago.

Westward from "Benson's House" is shown the old "Council House" on the present Deseret News site. The building was the home of the early Utah Legislature, and served as a crude for the University of Utah. In 1853 it was so badly damaged by fire and explosion of powder in an adjacent building that it was abandoned.

The only other building that can be recognized is the residence of the well known Bishop Woolley of the Thirteenth ward, on the site of the University club, the Alta club and the Packard library. Bishop Woolley's ward was then the center of the city's social life, and Bishop Woolley was a character whom all overland travelers sought to meet and be entertained by. He acquired great fame in the days of the gold rush.
