HOW TO MITIGATE THE CALAMITY.

A MUNICIPAL BOARD OF HEALTH SUGGESTED.

Editor Deseret News:

Benjamin Franklin truthfully said "Public health is public wealth," and the great English Premier, Disraeli, observed, "The health of the people is the first duty of the statesman." These quotations are respectfully submitted to the serious consideration of our city fathers.

The calamitous diphteria, which continues to prevail in this locality, should awaken the citizens and municipal authorities to action, with a view to stopping the progress of the dire scourge. This city is unusually well situated to give its inhabitants the best possible advantages for the maintenance of health, and it is simply the fault of the people and city council, that the same are permitted to exist prejudicial to health.

The owners of houses and lots are to blame for the existence of disgusting privy vaults, loathsome pig pens, filthy stables and corrals, rotting manure and garbage, and other cesspools, noxious accumulations of slops, and other breeders of disease. No reasonable excuse can be given for permitting these things to become nuisances. There should be no hole in the ground for the reception and retention of fecal matter. Ash bins could conveniently furnish disinfectant material for the contents of closets, and render it easy to remove the accumulation of the offensive waste matter.

near residences, besides being a positive injury to health, is a great source of annoyance and worry, concerning how to properly dispose of the same. Other cities, of less magnitude than this, it is considered the duty of the authorities to provide for the removal of pestiferous matter, why should it not be done here? The public health demands that it be rendered innoxious, and moved to where it can be utilized, or at least, do no harm, and some of the public might well be devoted to that purpose. It seems to me that no household would object to a reasonable sum, occasionally, towards getting offensive matter removed from his lot or doorway.

There is no more prolific disease breeder than the pig and its pen. Many scientists and doctors declare that next to over-indulgence of appetite, is the greatest cause of human ailments. If people will persist in eating the accursed thing, which has been declared to be pestilential, let them do so, but they should, at any rate, be banished from the city limits. Give the swine a field to run in, away from human habitation, feed them on garbage, or other delectable food, and they will naturally excrete their waste matter, and cause no much trouble to anyone who ignores God's law by devouring them.

It is an evidence of laziness in the owners if they allow manure to accumulate in stables and corrals to fester and pollute the atmosphere, and render unhealthy the cows or other animals that have to stand or wallow in it. It is only common sense that our municipal officers are, to some extent, censurable for not compelling such law people to observe the provisions relating to such matters. The people have a right to the natural pure air of our mountain retreats, and who pollute it, by permitting offensive nuisances to exist, should be punished.

It was pertinently remarked by a friend of mine, a few months ago, that "any law that is not enforced is a dead letter." I am sure that our city fathers, to be consistent, should strike all such from the statute book. I hope to see the day when the people will not be allowed to pollute the air, and that all such laws will be enforced.
