In Woman's World

Through the efforts of the Rev. Caroline Bartlett Crane 499 small bank accounts are in active operation in the Savings-Bank of Kalamazoo. The savings collector, who is a paid trained worker, collected in the first eighteen months of her service $14,452.41, which would otherwise have melted away in foolish expenditure. Gift-framed crayon portraits on the walls, stork clocks on the mantels, while the household furnishings are sadly out of repair and the children's shoes out at the heels, are in many of the homes where the savings collector is at work. The money used to go, now, to the savings collector, who makes weekly rounds, gets there before the agent with a glittering installment-plan bangle. She receives an amount from five cents upward, enters it on the owner's bank-book, and carries to the bank for deposit.

"My husband says to me, 'Ain't you ashamed to give out so little to a bank?'" declared one woman, who handed over thirty-five cents, "but I says, No, I ain't, cause the bank lady says, 'It's all right.'"

It is this encouragement that is helping many a family to save. They never did it on their own initiative, because they couldn't brave the splendor of a mahogany desk and a comfortable chair with their meager income. Now, it is saved penny by penny during the week, and when the bank lady comes it is brought proudly out from the crowded closet, the old party shelf, from the best treasure in the china cupboard and from the old black stocking in the lower machine drawer. One family is saving to buy a home. One woman who seems for a moment now counts seventy dollars in the fund she is laying by with which to send her daughter through college. The largest of the accounts is not over two hundred dollars. These are drawn on in time of need. But that is precisely what they are for. With these funds have been bought hundreds of bushels of coal, and scores of new coats, some of which the Charities organization would otherwise have been obliged to supply.

It was out of an investigation of the chattering, gossip, that the savings collection work developed—Mabel Potter Daggett in The Delineator for June.

Remember that the great thing is to put yourself in the other person's place. Suppose you were an ignorant mother. Suppose your home were dark and dirty, and your facilities for improving them depended on a drunken husband or an income of eight dollars a week. Suppose it was your child who was sickly and although there was a remedy, you did not know it. And suppose that your child, of its scrawny neck and its big wobbly head and weak little body, you loved it—loved it so dearly that you carried more times to it with your constant fondling and your anemic, microbe-laden kisses—what would you do? And when the heat came, and the Summer-disease came, and death stalked at your heels as it stalks at hers what would you do?

This is a rich world. There are loads of ideas and lots of strength in it. If some of the Thomas P. Ryan and J. P. Morgan and (other) masters' financial ability would only turn their attention to organizing our social forces so as to look after things, we would soon be out of the darkness. But mean while, here is this problem, here and now in those hot days. Here are the ignorant mothers, the sick children, the pathetic little funerals, the darkness and sorrow. What do you think you ought to do about it? Sit by the seashore or the mountain-side and sympathize?

Society is a great organized, working association. Its basic, underlying idea is that each shall help the other. This is religion—this is social economy. What do you think that, as an honest member of that society, you should do? What will you do?—The Delineator for August.

The housekeeper who uses her chafing dish only for the purpose for which it was originally intended is not making the most of her opportunities, for there are scores in which it may advantageously appear on the family table. Especially is this true where the table equipment is none too ample. If, for instance, the table service does not boast a soup tureen, the ingenious housekeeper has only to discard the entire chafing-dish set with the exception of the hot-water pan and the cover. The upper pan, usually designated the "blazer," is set aside with the rest, and the cover put directly on the hot-water pan. This improvised soup tureen may be placed on the small circular tray which usually comes in connection with the chafing-dish set, and with the addition of a soup ladle, the outfit is complete.

If the housekeeper lacks an attractive baking-dish for vegetables, macaroni, oysters or the hundred and one au gratin dishes now so popular, and which should be served direct from the dish in which they are baked, she has but to take the hot-water pan belonging to her chafing-dish set and have it fitted into either a graniteware baking-dish or one of fireproof earthenware. This inside dish should be so carefully chosen as to size that it will fit inside the hot-water pan closely and come just a little below the metal rim. A careful and patient search for just the particular size is sure to be rewarded. However, if it is not possible between the two dishes when one is set inside the other, it may easily and prettily be concealed by a garnish of parsley or a frilling of white tissue-paper long enough to go around the inner dish.

The hot-water pan as a receptacle also applies to the baking of puddings.

"Hurry is the devil," says an Arabian proverb. Although we understand that the oriental has a constitutional prejudice against haste, it might be well for us to consider the above proverb seriously applied to ourselves as a nation. The morning paper gives us a daily list of deaths by suicide, apoplexy and insanity—men in the prime of life rushing into eternity, desperate because they are left behind in the race, or driven mad by the rush at the business world.

What is the matter? Is it the changing climate that stimulates the nervous system to abnormal activity? Is it the struggle for money? Is it the desire to emulate others, or is it habit?

A distinguished foreigner in writing his impressions of us says that we are not accomplishing anything more than if we were quiet; that we are doing it merely to give the impression of activity. We take ourselves too seriously. The woman who flutters about, creating confusion in the office, who is doing the most work in the world, is weary and exhausted afterwards. Hurry suggests bad planning or carelessness. Hurry means loss of dignity and power. Hurry means fear, and fear is the greatest enemy to success.

Can we stop hurrying? Some answer that we must keep up with the procession or drop out entirely. Let us see if we can do a better thing. Let us take thought and begin to reform. As tension expresses itself in bodily movements, we must first learn muscular control. Relaxation means letting go, and while we are learning to let go we are getting ourselves trained to take hold again when the time comes, for relaxation teaches far more than rest.

We will not hurry when we know the danger to the nervous system; when we realize fully that we gain power by working quietly; when we believe that we are living in Eternity—Theodore Dresser in The Delineator.

WALSH FORTUNE REVEALS ROMANCE OF A POOR BOY

The fortune at stake in the fate of John R. Walsh will remain one of the most dramatic evidences of the poor boy's chance in the United States, for while not of the Hawley or Harriman rank, it runs into many millions. The statement of securities taken by the associated banks of Chicago when they liquidated the deposits of the Chicago National and other Walsh banks proved to include $3,000,000 of bonds of the Illinois Southern railway, nearly $2,000,000 of bonds of the Chicago Southern railway, over $2,000,000 of those of the Southern Indiana railway, $4,000,000 of Illinois Southern stock, the Bedford stone quarries and other items which bring the total to $14,000,000. Walsh began life as a Chicago newsboy, and at the death of his bank career he had such political influence, through the backing of Sullivan, Hopkins, Jamieson and Smyth, that he took hold of the state, county, city, and West South and Lincoln park boards and finally the funds of the drainage district. The Chicago National had $10,000,000 in deposits and the Home Savings bank $4,000,000, the total liabilities of those banks and the Equitable Trust company reaching a total of $26,000,000. During his trial in the federal court for fraudulent banking, Mr. Walsh practically ignored his defense, leaving it to his attorneys and his friends, while he devoted his tremendous energy to efforts to conserve his assets and again become the figure of commanding importance in financial circles of the west.
