SANFORD'S RADICAL CURE For CATARRH

INSTANTLY relieves and permanently cures this loathsome disease in all its varying stages. It possesses the soothing and healing properties of plants, herbs and barks in their essential form, free from every chronic contamination, and in fact is expected every hour from every other known remedy. In one short year it has found its way from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, and wherever known has become the standard remedy for the treatment of Catarrh. The proprietors have been waited upon by gentlemen of national reputation who have been cured by this remedy, and who have sent countless expense and personal trouble, spread the good news throughout the circles in which they move, that they may hear a word of comfort of intelligence and refinement say, "I owe my life to Sanford's Radical Cure." Would they know that it is an article of great value, and worthy to be classed among the standard medical specifics of the day.

THE benefit I derive from its daily use is to me priceless.
HENRY WELLS, of Wells, Fargo & Co.

IT has cured me after twelve years of unintermitted suffering.
GEO. W. HOUGHTON, Waltham, Mass.

I FOLLOWED the directions to the letter and am happy to say I have had a permanent cure.
D. F. GRAY, M. D., Muscatine, Iowa.

I HAVE recommended it to quite a number of my patients, all of whom have been loud in their high estimate of its value and good effects with them.
WM. BOWEN, 225 Pine St., St. Louis.

AFTER using two bottles I find myself permanently cured. I have since recommended over one hundred bottles with the greatest success.
WM. J. KNISTERN, Jr., Lynn, Mass.

WE have sold Sanford's Radical Cure for nearly one year and can say candidly that we never sold a similar preparation that gave such universal satisfaction. We have yet to learn of the first failure.
A. D. BALDWIN & CO., Washington, Ind.

THE cure effected in my case by Sanford's Radical Cure was so remarkable that it seemed to those who had suffered with me for years as one of the usual remedies that it could not be true. I therefore made affidavit to it before Seth J. Thomas, Justice of the Peace, New Haven, Ct.
GEORGE V. DIMMOCK, Druggist, Boston.

Each package of Sanford's Radical Cure contains Dr. Sanford's Improved Inhaling Tube, and full directions for its use in all cases. Price, $1.00; or sent by mail on receipt of price. Druggists and dealers throughout the United States and Canada.

The Missing Pages.

"Have a paper, sh? Something to read in the cars, ma'm! Harper's! Atlantic! Scribner! All the magazines!"

But the people hurried past John's little stand into the station, as they had done all the morning. Only the Post and Journal sold, and here was noon! Profit, three cents! On sunny days his sales were pretty brisk, but it was drizzling. The thick, Pittsburg air was full of falling soot, and nobody cared to stop to buy.

"No wonder they want to hurry out of this horrible place!" muttered John, looking about at the wet, dingy houses, the pools of black mud, through which the horses tramped, and the clouds of smoke rolling through the streets. He thought of the sunny Ohio farm on which he was born, and felt that he could never grow used to this place. Three cents profit! Not enough to buy a loaf of bread.

John thought of his mother, and of the scanty breakfast which they had eaten together in their bare garret, with its windows opening on the sooty roofs. If he could but have had a good trade he might have carried a nice little treat home to her. But the crowd hurried past, and nobody stopped.

"Magazine, ma'm? Something to read on the——"

The lady stopped. "Godey? Ah, your books are dirty!" dropping the sooty magazine with a shrug.

As if he could help that! But he began blowing away the soot for the twentieth time that day. It was four years since his father died, and he and his mother had come down to town, and in that time he had done nothing but fight weakly against soot and starvation.

He opened one of the story papers for boys. There was a sea-story in it; a boy goes off in the first chapter as a stowaway; in the third, "the gallant lad leaped upon deck, and the commodore clasped him in his arms!"

On the next page was an account of a boy going home from work, who arrived just in time to scale the walls of a burning house, and rescue a child, for which daring act he was the next day taken into partnership by the child's father, a millionaire.

"Some fellows have such splendid chances!" said John, laying down the paper with a sigh. "Now, I've been here for years, and nothing grand or noble ever turns up for me to do. Buy ten Posts, fifteen Journals daily; sell them, if I can. On Saturdays, buy the weeklies. Once a month the magazines. That's the heft of it, year in and year out. How's a fellow to make a ten-strike at that sort of work?"

An old gentleman who had missed the train, sauntered up and began idly looking over the boy's stock.

John watched him anxiously. If he should buy one of the six bound books! Profit was twenty-five cents. If he should buy one of those, he could take home a little treat to his mother after all.

The boy's eyes fairly glistened, for, besides being fond of his mother, he was hungry; and the smell of fried oysters and coffee from the restaurant near was almost more than he could bear.

The old gentleman took up one of the books. John thought he was certainly going to buy one. What should the treat be? A bit of fresh meat? A mince-pie? He decided that the steak would be best.

"Ah! here is a book which I have wanted for a long time," said the gentleman. "What's the price of this, my boy?"

"Those are one dollar each, sir."

"I'll take this. No, you needn't wrap it up. I'll read it on the cars."

He laid down a bright trade dollar.

John could almost smell the delicious steak, and he thought of his mother's thin, starved face. They had not tasted meat for days. But a glance at the book, as the gentleman dropped it into his satchel, caused him to say, faintly:

"Stop, sir! I did not see which one you had taken. That is an imperfect copy. There are four leaves missing in the middle."

"Too bad!"—throwing it down. "The dollar please."

"Will none of the others suit?" said John.

"No. I have wanted this book for some time."

"You can have it for seventy-five cents," said John, eagerly.

"I don't want a mutilated copy at all."

John handed him back the dollar, and closing his satchel, the man walked on a few steps, and sat down in an open doorway to wait for his train. He was a rudy, fat old gentleman, with a kindly, shrewd blue eye. Having nothing to do, he thought the occurrence over leisurely.

"That's an honest lad," he said to the proprietor of the shop in which he stood. "He might have cheated me just now, but he did not."

"Who? John M'Tavish? As honest as steel. He's been under my eye now for four years, and I know him to be as truthful a lad as ever was born of Scotch blood."

"Um, um!" said the old gentleman. But he put on his spectacles and eyed John from head to foot.

The next day he stopped at the same shop, and walked up to the proprietor.

"How's he for intelligence, now?" he began, as if the conversation had stopped the moment before. "Stupid, probably?"

"I don't think he's very sharp in trade," was the reply; "but he's a very handy boy. He has made a good many convenient knick-knacks for the neighbors — that book-shelf for instance."

"Why, that's the very thing I want in a boy! Well, there's my train. Good-day, sir."

"He'll be back again. Odd old fellow, said the merchant, laughing.

The next day he was back, and he came at the same hour.

"I like that boy's looks sir. I've been watching him. But of course he has a dozen relations—drunken father, rag-tag of brothers—who would follow him?"

"No. He has only a mother, and she is a decent, God-fearing Scotch woman—a good seamstress, John tells me, but can get no work. Times are dull here just now. Pity the country folks will pour into the cities. Mrs. M'Tavish has nothing but what the boy earns at his stand yonder."

The old gentleman made no reply. But the next day he went up to the boy's stand. John was looking pale and anxious. Some of his regular customers had refused to take their magazines—times being so hard. They would be a dead loss on his hands.

"Paper? Magazines, sir?" he asked.

"No. A word with you, my lad. My name is Bohnn. I am the owner of the Bordale Nurseries, about thirty miles from here. I want a young man to act as clerk and salesman on the grounds, at a salary of forty dollars a month, and a woman who will be strict and orderly, to oversee the girls who pack flower-seeds, at twenty-four dollars a month. I offer the positions to you and your mother, and I give you until to-morrow to think it over."

"But you—you—you don't know me, sir," gasped John.

"I know you very well. I generally know what I am about. To-morrow be ready to give your answer. I will take you four weeks on trial. If I am satisfied, the engagement will be renewed for a year."

All the rest of the day John felt like one in a dream. Everybody had heard of the Bordale Nurseries, and of good old Isaac Bohnn, the owner. But what had he done that this earthly paradise should be opened to him?

"You'll come, eh?" said Mr. Bohnn, the next day. "Thought you would. When can you begin work?"

"At once, sir."

"Good! By the way, there's a vacant house on the grounds which your mother can have, rent free, if she remains with me. A mere box, but big enough—big enough. There's my team. Suppose you come out, M'Tavish and look about you. You can come back at night.

John locked up the stand, sent a message to his mother, and went with Mr. Bohnn. He had not yet told his mother of the change in their affairs.

He was very silent when he came home that night, but oddly tender with his mother; and she noticed that he remained a long time on his knees at prayer that night.

They had only a little bread and milk for breakfast the next morning, and John scarcely tasted it.

"You look as if you could not bear this much longer, mother," he said, coming up to her and putting his hands upon her shoulder.

"You need good wholesome meals, and the fresh air, and the hills and the trees, instead of this!" looking out at the piled stacks of chimneys, belching forth the black smoke of an iron foundry.

"Don't talk of them, John, lad!"

"Well, I won't;" and he put on his hat and went out.

An hour later he came back.

"What is wrong? Why have you left the stand?" his mother asked in alarm.

"We are going to have an outing, mother. Don't say a word. I can afford it."

She never had seen the boy so full of excitement. He hurried her to the station, and soon they were gliding among beautiful rolling hills, and across lovely meadows, that were sweet with the odor of new-mown hay. At noon they came to stretches of rising ground, covered with nurseries of young trees of delicate green, and with vineyards, and field after field of roses, mignonette, and all kinds of sweet smelling flowers.

"Why, John, this is fairyland! What is this place?"

"The Bordale Nurseries. We will get off here, mother. I want to show you a house that—"

He trembled with agitation. His face was pale as he led her down to the side of the broad, glancing river, near which was nestled in the woods a cosey little cottage, covered with a red trumpet-creeper. There was a garden, a well, and a paddock for a cow. Inside, the rooms were clean and ready for furnishing. The river rippled drowsily against its pebbly shore; the birds darted through the blue, sunny air; the scent of roses came in upon the breeze.

"Mother," said John, "this, I hope, will be your home now." And with that he began to laugh and caper about her like a boy; but the tears rolled down his thin cheeks.

John McTavish is now foreman of the Bordale Nurseries, and a man of high standing in the country. Not long ago he said to old Mr. Bohnn:

"I owe this all to the friend who said a good word for me that day in Pittsburgh."

"No, John," said the old man, "you owe it to the book with the missing pages. The chance came to you, as it comes to every boy, to be honest. Honesty and industry, John, are what did it, and I am inclined to think they never fail to command success in the end.—Youth's Companion.
