Many of the wagons had been without food for thirty-six hours. Their faces and bodies were emaciated and their eyes were sunken. The men were weak and listless, and all were with out spirits. The road was rough and rocky, and the jolting was enough to kill a strong man, if long exposed to it.

From nearly every wagon, as the horses trotted on, urged by whip and spur, came such cries and shrieks as these:

"Oh, God, why can't I die?"

"Oh, God, will you not have mercy and kill me?"

"Oh, God, for God's sake stop for one minute! Take me out and leave me to die on the roadside!"

"Oh, God, for God's sake stop for one minute! Take me out and leave me to die on the roadside!"

BOUQUAULT'S "SHAGBRAIN."

How THE CHARACTER OF "CON" REQUESTED THEM TO THE "DESERET."

Of all the stories so far told about the playwright, Dion Bouquault, nothing to my mind, says a New York Star writer, is half so amusing as the account of his career to date.

The character of "Con the Shagbrain" was taken from real life, and suggested itself to Bouquault under peculiar circumstances. At the time when many men were being taken from the streets and put to death for the crime of murder, Bouquault was in the city of New York, and he was in the habit of going to the courts to see the trials.

One day he saw a man being taken from the streets and put to death for the crime of murder. The man was a black man, and he was a very handsome man. He was a very handsome man, and he was a very handsome man.

The man was a black man, and he was a very handsome man. He was a very handsome man, and he was a very handsome man. He was a very handsome man, and he was a very handsome man.
