in another column, the Græco-Turkish plot thickens. The English fleet has been ordered to check the warlike preparations of the Greeks. Meantime, the Greek fleet, consisting of thirty-three vessels, has put to sea in order to avoid being blockaded by the British. When to this is added the further fact that seven Turkish ironclads are cruising in the vicinity, it looks next to impossible that there should not soon be some startling developments in that quarter of Europe. All is not yet peace.
