

FEARFUL SCENE AT WARSAW.

Sometime since we noticed a telegram announcing that an attempt had been made to assassinate the Russian General Berg, by flinging at his carriage an Orsini bomb, as he was riding through the streets of Warsaw. A correspondent of the London Post, writing from that place, on the 20th ult. gives a vivid sketch of the occurrence and its frightful sequel:—

"The missile was thrown in the narrowest part of the street, between the home of Count Andrew Zameysky and the Saxon Palace. When the smoke cleared away General Berg was found to be unhurt in his carriage. Trustworthy witnesses of the scene, who were at their windows at the time, declare that it was perfectly impossible either for them or General Berg, blinded with the smoke, or for his escort, to see whence the bomb fell. The police at the corner of the street were so frightened that they concealed themselves, so that they could not even have a suspicion of the house where the author of the attempt was. It was a moment of suspense, fear and uncertainty. Meanwhile, Berg, having arrived at the orderly room, gave certain orders whose nature subsequent events disclosed and afterwards, surrounded by a fresh convoy, rode home. One thousand infantry and cavalry now proceeded in a wide column from the orderly room in the direction of the spot where the attempt had been made. On the road they arrested, in the most brutal manner every person they met, driving all before them with their bayonets. They then entered both the houses of Count Zameysky one of which is strictly a private house, occupied by his household exclusively, and the other, perhaps the most magnificent house in Warsaw, fitted up in a most luxurious style, and occupied by nearly one hundred opulent and highly respectable families. That the bomb should have been thrown from one of these houses was most improbable and I have already pointed out that it was impossible to know which was the house from whence it was thrown. What were the scenes that were enacted in these, perhaps the most respectable houses in Warsaw, between five in the afternoon and twelve at night, God only knows. The crowd outside saw the windows all smashed, and the furniture, books, pictures, mirrors, pianos, dresses and cupboards thrown out into the street; and they heard in the midst of the yells of the savage soldiery the noise of the breaking of furniture, and the despairing cries and groans of women. After seven hours of destruction the soldiery dragged the male inhabitants, upwards of two hundred in number, covered with wounds and contusions to the citadel. These poor people were without hats or coats, and their clothes were nearly torn off their backs. Among them were several old men, whose weary and despairing looks moved the bystanders to tears. In Miodowa street, where there is a church, these unfortunate people knelt down to say a silent prayer; but the soldiery rushed upon them with their bayonets, tore them from their kneeling position, and forced them to march on. Meanwhile the women and children, thus deprived of their natural protectors, were exposed to the insults and obscene jokes of the drunken soldiery, without a home—even without warm clothing against the cold. About 11 o'clock P.M., a short time before the men were taken to the citadel, a lurid light was seen in the sky above the spot where these scenes occurred. It was thought that this must be a fire, caused either by accident or despair. The fire brigades immediately collected from all parts of the town, but the soldiers who were posted in the street would not allow them to enter it, and even threw furniture into the flames as fuel. The fire lasted all night, and this morning three heaps of ashes are all that remain of the residences and homes of nearly one hundred families. Among the victims I will only mention Prince Thaddeus Lubomirski and Count Stanislaus Zameyski (brother of Count Andrew). The residences of both have been razed to the ground and both are now in prison. The well known Oriental scholar Kowaleski rector of the University, owed his personal safety to the accident of his absence from home, but of his furniture, his books and his magnificent Oriental library—the fruit of some thirty years' judicious collection—nothing remains. The very valuable library of Prince Thaddeus Lubomirski, who has for some time been occupied in writing a history of Poland, has been completely destroyed in the fire. As for other articles, which, in the eyes of the barbarous soldiery, were of more value—such as furs, dresses, gilt, furniture, etc.—they were taken to the citadel, there is no doubt, to be divided among those who showed the most zeal in the work of destruction. The immense stores of the wine merchant Krupecki have been completely destroyed."

Paper Making.—Any sensible man, who understands paper making, and will make it, can find immediate employment at the Paper Mill, Sugar House Ward: Apply to Mr. Levi Stewart at the Mill, or at his residence in the 8th Ward.

We are interested in the success of this enterprise, and shall be too proud to help some sterling, reliable man who will buckle to and assist in making paper.

Who will do it forthwith?

Died:
