Still, it is rather humiliating that a national election and the consequent fate of a great nation like this should hinge, in large part, upon the action of the most worthless portion of the com- munity, those who would vote for either party, and particularly for the party that was likely to win. If there should be a change in the party in power, we may expect to see, among the unscrupulous and noisy partisans who vegetate here about, many notable changes of opinion and profession. Many of the unco "loyal," who heretofore have been staunch and blatant sup- porters of the party now in power, will become converted into equally staunch and blatant Democrats, and they will be ready to swear that they were always good and true Democrats at the backbone, though nobody would have dream- ed of it, not even themselves, so long as the Republicans were in power.
