The Coaling Gangs in St. Thomas. There are two or three coal-wharves where gangs of negresses may be seen at almost any time unloading the coa from Euglish and American vessels Four or five men are employed 10 fill ing the baskets (about forty pound each), and lifting them up to the carriers' heads; the women trot one after the other and dump their burdens on the great coal pile, singing very often the rude but not unmelodious tunes that they have invented. For delicate ears it is well that these songs are in the negro patois, which cannot be understood by foreigners; often the words are as bad as possible, and they form a very true index of the beastly life that these poor creatures lead. They are a caste apart; only the most depraved will enter these gangs, and even the not over-moral town negresses decline to associate with them The West Indian coaling gangs are indeed a disgrace to civilization Whether the coal merchants and the people are indifferent or powerless certain is that they have done pothing machinery can be instituted for all this hand work. It has been pointed out a hundred times that the gangs are encouraged in idleness and vice. These women at the wharves get, perhaps, sixty cents per day, which is twice the wage of an able-bodied country la-borer. But when a steamer is taking on and the work must be hastened, the carriers are paid according to their labor-a cent or even two cents for each basketful. I was told of one woman who carried four hundred baskets between surrise and dark, and often they worked far into the night. Commonly they earn enough in a day to keep them idle for a week. Idleness and depravity have gone together ever since the time of Dr. Watts, at least; depravity in its work form is whether
