 THE EVENING NEWS.

It was my privilege to see something of the English in two country houses of different character. One was about sixty or seventy miles from London, in a rich, well-titled country—a old-fashioned stone house in the centre of the property, within half an hour's walk of a small village. An American backwoodsman would have described the whole country as town, the landscape was so closely dotted with houses. There was blithely cordial hospitality in my reception, with that effort to suppress feeling inherent in English character.

Everything was simple, solid, and comfortable. The host, known as the squire, a hale, hearty man of fifty, asked me the morning after my arrival, "I would like to see a bit of a turn." Supposing this to be an invitation to go over his grounds, I assented, when I was led off to the brick house for the miles and the return, making ten. The squire was evidently trained to the exercise and did not feel it, while I was much fagged. The exercise was in the neighborhood of every day. For a mile round were two or three fine dwellings, the rest small tenements, of which many were white-washed and thatched, the roads bordered with hedges, rolling sweeps of ground in lawn or forest or under cultivation. There were many hills in these walks. The squire called out with his sonorous voice to the laborers in the field touching the crops: hung over the gates and fences to talk with the women and children concerning their domestic affairs, from which it appeared that the cottagers were in frequent relations with the folks of the hall, in the way of gifts of coal, clothing, food, and medicine. The questions concerning the life of a family, its misfortunes and hopes, were many, but with a bluff voice and impressive face, the squire, who was the orphan whippersnapper in the account of the squire's troubles, as they did in one or two instances, the voice of the squire grew harder, but he blew his nose and complained of a cold.

In a school of thirty or forty pupils we listened to the recitations, when the squire's mask of indifference could not altogether hide a gleam of satisfaction. Learning from the teacher that the establishment was of my companion's creating and kept up at his expense, I ventured a word of praise, when he returned in a voice of depression: "This sort of thing pleases my wife, you know. It's one of her pets."

Thus did his worst foe go forward in what related to himself, which is second nature in the best English type. The women hurried to us on the high-road and in the houses, and I remarked on the singularities of the proceedings. "Ay, ay, the ladies haven't been to dancing-school, as you see, was the squire's remark, when I explained that the act was referred to and not the manner."

"To you democratic Americans, I dare say, it does look odd. I tell you it is useless to bob up and down in that absurd way, but they will do it."

The master of the house was of the old fox-hunting school, and his dinner were solid, flanked with sherry and port. In compliance with old customs, the women retired toward the end of the repast, though they were removed, and decanters of port on wheels were placed on the naked table, labelled in silver with their respective ages. These were industriously pushed around, each pouring a generous portion as they went by. The clergyman of the neighboring church was generally one of the guests and helped himself as liberally as the others. When the decanters and several times made the circuit of the table, I endeavored to excuse myself from further libation on the score of lack of capacity. With this business character, the squire of the English race, I was requested not to be such a Miss Nancy, and he poked me in the chest. There was no help for it, and I was obliged to empty my glass with the rest. This continued for nearly two hours, when we arose from the table and marched unsteadily to the drawing-room to join the hostess and her friends. For my own part, I am persuaded that it would have been difficult for me to say, "The scenery is truly rural and lovely. My companion, whose libations had been more copious than mine, were probably thicker of utterance and more obtuse of eye-brain than I. The advent into the drawing-room was singular, but elicited no manifestation of surprise or remark from the women, who had evidently grown accustomed to it.

From their thick tongues came heavy platitudes, and the squire of the old fox-hunting school, accompanied by the hostess, a little fat, middle-aged woman, Western under the reign of Queen Victoria. One fell into a doze, the others settled down into raptures of whist. In an hour strong tea was served, restoring the sleeping and the waking to animation. At an early hour all retired. The next morning we saw them up early, without a sign of the previous night's wandering on their ruddy faces. A soft, damp climate, fanned by the sea-breeze, and the vigorous exercise, gave them stomachs that bore these daily burdens with ease. They were free of the American malady, dyspepsia. There was strong food and stronger drink, but no special disturber of the stomach's repose. The fortified Briton might manage our incongruities without much detriment; but we, sustained neither by climate nor out-door exercise, must regard the task as hopeless.

This household may be regarded as representative for England is full of such. A sense of duty, the leading trait, which showed itself in taking care of the poor, providing instructions for the needy young, contributing to different charitable societies, subscribing for religious journals and magazines, and tracing and missionaries to the wild heathen, were regular to church—their pleasure seldom appeared to be completely unalloyed, as it is with French and Italian, whose conscience seemed to question them at untimely seasons. They were happiest when pushing the decanter about on wheels, which put the too watchful monitor to rest. The traditional explanation in France of this vein of sadness in the English character—and the American has it also—is that it stems from the spleen, suggested by the planation of a question of race and moral training is very Gallic. If the beyond-chaos of the world would be closer, they would doubtless find that the Englishman is possessed of psychological bloom, as the lark is joyous, the dog is faithful, and the owl is mournful.
