

SEDUCTION AND SUICIDE.

The body of a young woman, seventeen years of age, was fished up from the bottom of the River Thames, London, England. On her breast was pinned her name and residence. The sad story is then given of the crime by which this poor creature was victimized, and for which neither the laws of England nor America have any adequate punishment. The jury brought in a verdict that she committed "suicide while in a state of unsound mind." The London Journal well asks: "How much longer will seduction continue to go unpunished in this country, except as a civil injury and by a fictitious and costly suit? How much longer will the man to bear all the consequences flowing from the sin of two souls, and to be goaded to child murder or suicide by the monstrous injustice of our law? If the scoundrel who sent this poor girl to perish in the river, with the label of death upon her as his last gift of love, had picked her pocket, or stolen the meanest article of her apparel, the 'majesty of the law' would have taken means to prevent James Langham from 'leaving the court' to deal with others as he has dealt with the young woman who trusted him too well. He only stole the 'immediate jewel of her soul,' and gave her for it contempt and calamity; whereupon our law has no penalty for the young villain but the corner's rebuke. And thus more 'ballast' of the same ghastly kind has gone, and will go, week by week, to the river bed; and the vice of brutish lust, openly acquitted in the very presence of its victims, is set free to shame our morality and to fill the streets with the lost feet of those who 'once were women.' It may be that a deeper sense of the insufficiency of the law to protect that innocence which is more valuable than life, and to defend the helpless from soul-murder, lies at the bottom of the persistent verdicts of acquittal given by juries in this country to the murderers of seducers. That the power of life and death ought to belong except in cases of self-defense, to society, in its organized capacity, few will deny; yet juries appear to consider that there are wrongs which society cannot redress—a very dangerous assumption—and act under uncertain and sympathetic impulses, rather than the literal requirements of the law."
