

'Error, sir! error!' exclaimed the dean. 'You shall see, sir; you shall see. I don't care for your ticket. You may make me pay again if you please. When I get to my destination, I believe this company is capable of anything; but I will teach them a lesson. This gentleman shall be my witness in the transaction—I will take your card, sir.' The men cleared from the window, for the engine whistle sounded, and off we went. 'Oblige me with your card, sir,' continued the dean. 'I need hardly ask you if you ever saw so notorious a proceeding.' 'Never, sir,' I replied. 'I believe it is a new one. But do you think it worth your while to take any further notice of it? It will involve you in a great deal of trouble.' 'Trouble, sir! What do I care for that?' demanded the dean indignantly. 'It is my duty to expose such conduct, and I will do it. I will thank you for your card, sir.'

'I said it would be dangerous to refuse a card, so I expressed my sympathy with him, and gave him the card of a foreign gentleman of my acquaintance, which I luckily had in my pocket. Then the old gentleman seemed to be brooding over his injury, and scarcely spoke another word. When he came to the refreshment station, the guard brought him his ticket, which he took without a syllable, and at our next station we both got out. I saw his carriage was waiting for him; and I have no doubt Mrs. Dean had all particulars before half an hour was over. As for my friend whose card I gave, I never heard whether the dean had tried to find him out or not; in fact although I called him my friend, we were by no means friendly. 'You think the whole transaction rather silly, eh?' ejaculated my companion, interrupting himself. 'I think it downright dishonest,' said I frankly, 'unless you repaid the dean.' 'Oh, I did that,' responded he. 'I sent the old gentleman a post-office order in the name of my foreign friend. I'm a racing man and up to a thing or two, but I'm straight as a die for honesty.'

Well, well, I wonder where my communicative friend is now. (Far as the publisher has gone, I can tell you often to the well in his case, as with the thousand other clever fellows we read of in their appropriate histories.)

A STORY OF A PAINTING.

BY A. JEFFREYS.

'That is a wonderful painting, sir; as natural as life,' I said to my host, as, coming into the parlor, my eye fell upon the 'three by four' neatly framed, which hung above the mantel. It was a room scene representing a group of persons surrounding two others—a young man and a girl—who were evidently just out of the water, for the crystal drops were dripping from their saturated locks and shining like diamonds in the light. There were some faults about it, but they were only minor ones, and considering the intention of the artist, not worth mentioning. The grouping was perfect, and the expression of curiosity and admiration which mingled on the faces was very lifelike; while as to coloring, including the light from the wood fire which blazed on the hearth and shed its mellow radiance on the scene, there was nothing left to wish for.

But the prominent feature of the picture, and that which caught my eye at once, was the expression of face and the attitude of the young man. He stood by one foot a little advanced; the chest, which was most elegantly proportioned, well thrown into shape, and somewhat elevated and the fingers slightly spread, as though he were speaking to some one, while the direction of his eyes, as well as their tender expression, showed that his speech was addressed to the young girl mentioned, whose face was raised toward him, and beaming with a depth of gratitude and admiration impossible to depict in words, and but rarely caught on canvas.

His was the most remarkable face I had ever seen; at least so I thought on beholding it then for the first time. If you examined it in detail, it was not perhaps, without its faults, but they were of feature only—the expression was faultless, and taking the whole as I looked upon the day I thought, so I say, that it was the most remarkable and beautiful man's face I had ever beheld. The head was small, the forehead high and finely arched, the cheeks firm and prominent, the chin round and brought well forward, the eyes dazzling with their fervid feeling, and the whole countenance glowing with a radiance of energy and conscious power that seemed to comprehend all weaker objects in itself, and to throw back the freight (which was necessary to bring out the expression of the other scene), as the faintest throw back the light of the lamp upon the table and cast it into shadow.

'Yes,' I said, 'a beautiful face.' 'You may well say so,' answered my host, 'but it is better than life—just as they came in on that dreadful night, escaped from a watery death.'

'Yes,' I replied, 'one can easily see the meaning of the artist. The lady had just been saved from drowning by this heroic youth.'

I am not apt to be enthusiastic over events that have long passed, nor to allow my imagination to be taken captive by stories which are intended to please the young, but somehow or other I was almost in love with that man in the picture, and I couldn't think of him as an ordinary individual. 'Any,' returned my host, 'heroic youth he was, and is, though his heroism has never been shown in any greater matter than the snatching of a fellow-being from a sudden death, and the risk of his own life. But there is a heroism in the smaller affairs as well as in the larger ones of life, and it is sometimes all the greater because it is shown without the hope of reward, which is quite as much the reward of merit with the man as with the boy. There are many heroes, and heroines too, whose quiet sacrifice of self, and steady courage in the face of trials worse than death, would raise them to the highest niche in the temple of Fame if suffered in the cause of country, but who pass down unheeded as oblivion might be cause the object for which these qualities are displayed is too trivial to interest the world. As to Edwin there' (indicating by a motion of his thumb the portrait in the picture), 'he was more remarkable than common, for he had a painter, which is even better than a hero, to record his virtues. If you should see the expression of that man's face, which this painting is intended to memorialize, in a paper or a book—supposing that it could be sold as well in print, which it is not, possibly—it wouldn't interest you half as much as that does now, because this glorious art not only tells the story to your mind, but engraves it upon your soul.'

It is conceded by manufacturers and thrashers that the improved Pitt's Thrashing Machine has no rival as a thrasher and cleaner. That it is at least as good as any built, and far superior to the machine they are now using, is proved by the fact that it was awarded at the World's Fair, in every exhibition, when brought into competition with other machines, its superiority was universally acknowledged, and in nearly every instance the first premium has been awarded to it.

We say to the friends of the Pitt's Machine to be sure and see one exhibited at the Fair on the following Machine Works, Dayton, Ohio.
