

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF A CITY

AS SEEN BY A SALT LAKE WOMAN

TEN thousand fleshy lambskins are clinging to the sky; I wonder how they strayed up there, don't you? They must have missed their hillside and wandered up too high. And thought, no doubt, instead of green, 'twas blue.

They're huddled close together Above the mountain crown; I think they're just about to jump, don't you? They're chasing helter-skelter, And now they're falling down In rain-drops, what a funny thing to do!

"It is not raining rain," so the song says, and it was not written by a Salt Lake. Nor is it raining roses. The poet says, "Roses that are the sweetest flower that ever drank the amber shower." That may be so, but we have no way of finding out, as our amber shower allowed not the roses to come out and prove their sweetness. "I wish the sky would rain down roses," says George Eliot, and we think it would be a refreshing change to see the valley pink and white and yellow instead of overcast with clouds, and shrouds, and mist, and shadow, and all that appertain to rain. And while it rains people must live in the streets, and in the street cars strange things happen.

A car was crowded to its utmost capacity one evening, and a gentleman who tells the following story was upon it.

"We were lined up in the aisle like sardines," said this gentleman to a friend. "I stood well up to the front, with two or three men behind me. When the conductor finally reached us to collect fares, I handed him a dollar, and before he could give me my change, he was called to the rear of the car. A woman had foolishly attempted to step off as the car slowed up, and, of course, stepped in the wrong direction, and was thrown to the ground."

"Naturally, there was a bit of a commotion, in which the conductor figured; fortunately, no bones were broken, but notwithstanding the man was so put about over the unnecessary excitement and delay, that upon returning with my change, he absent-mindedly handed it to the passenger behind me, who, to my utmost astonishment, took it. "See here, conductor," I exclaimed, "you've handed the change to the wrong man."

"The conductor wheeled about and confronted the passenger, who calmly turned to me and said, politely enough, "I beg your pardon, sir, but the conductor handed me my own change."

"For a moment confusion reigned supreme, that is, so far as the conductor was concerned; the polite passenger was calm enough. I suppose if appearance or facial expression counted against a man in a case of this kind, I certainly looked the part of the guilty one; I always detest a scene, and if I am acting in one I usually get painfully red in the face."

"It was dined awkward to say the least. I felt reasonably certain that the suave passenger had pocketed my change, yet having no positive proof that he had not, also given the conductor a dollar, I could not stand there and openly accuse him of theft. Neither could I swear that the conductor had not thoughtlessly pocketed my change. At any rate, the latter flatly refused to dig up another $5, and the former did not seem inclined to hand over his—my mine, rather—and thus the affair ended; that is, so far as the money went."

"By and bye, as the car dropped one after another of its human burdens, the smiling passenger took advantage of a vacated seat, depositing his numerous and sundry belongings alongside. I may repeat it, but I could not but have a suspicious thought concerning those mysterious little bundles, after my recent experience with the owner."

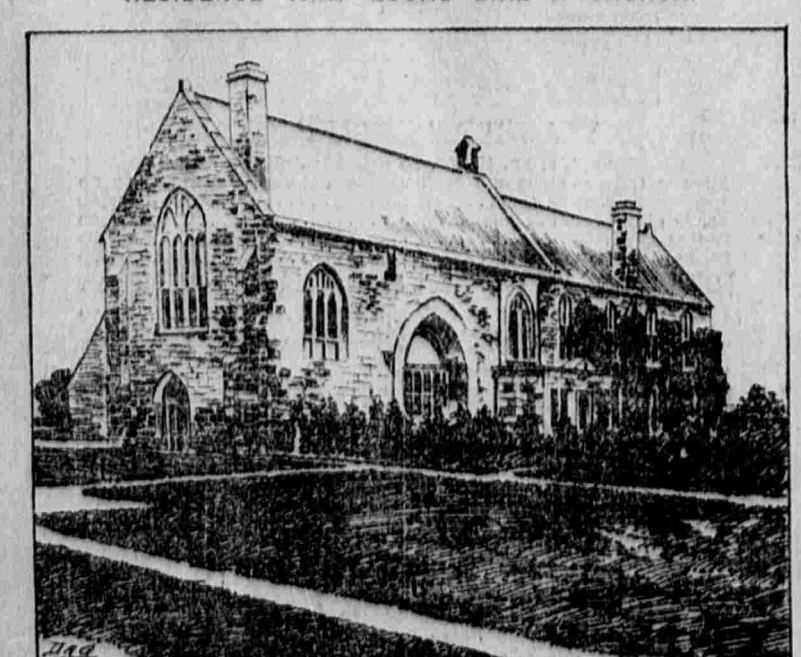

"Many blocks we traveled together until at length, shouldering his load, my friend got off leaving one bundle overlooked upon the seat which I now took. Somehow I was possessed of the feeling that that particular bundle rightly belonged to me, and forthwith carried it home with me, secure in the knowledge that it was mine."

AN IMPRESSIVE MOSLEM RELIGIOUS CEREMONY IN ALGERIA.

The picture shows a very impressive religious ceremony which is held in the outskirts of the holy city of Biskara, in Algeria, on the border of the Sahara. It is performed by hundreds of white-robed Arabs, who follow the strictest Moslem ritual. The earlier part of the service is recited standing, but at a certain point the whole great assembly falls prostrate.

RESIDENCE THAT LOOKS LIKE A CHURCH.

The handsome structure, St. Valere's Priory, shown in the cut was at one time the religious headquarters of a community of French monks domiciled in England. After many years of neglect it has recently been restored and is now the country residence of a London merchant named Sage.

with water-tight spherical joints, make it easy for the crew to paddle about. A wheel at the forward end facilitates moving along on the bottom, and a movable arm with watertight spherical joint is provided for gathering sponges, with a large basket to hold them. Electric lamps are fed by a storage battery.

An improved ornamental glass—more transparent than the old and designed to reflect color—has been developed by Fritz Puhl and August Wagner, of Berlin. The gold or silver panes in mosaic work have been made by pouring melted glass upon a metal film and then causing a thin sheet of glass to adhere to the film by heating, the product being a glass reflecting gold or silver light but almost opaque, the feeble light transmitted being of a dirty yellow or gray color. In the new process the metal is made to thoroughly coalesce with the glass. The film is applied to the first layer of glass mechanically or by chemical or electro-lytic method, and melted glass is then poured on to form the second layer, giving perfect union and great transparency. The panes have a beautiful gold or silvery lustre by reflected light, while the transmitted rays are more or less colored and give a pleasing antique effect. Mosaics may be made up with both the new glass and the old, and the new material is adapted not only for windows but for lanterns, lamp chimneys and other uses.

Cactus, instead of petroleum, is the mosquito exterminator that is being tested by the sanitary authorities of Gabon, French Africa. The thick, pulpy leaves are cut up and macerated in water, and the sticky paste so formed is spread over stagnant pools, giving the isolating layer that destroys the mosquito larvae by preventing them from coming up to breathe. The paste retains its place for weeks and months, while the petroleum quickly dries up and disappears in the fierce heat of a tropical sun.

A simple compass-finder, costing 11 cents, has enabled a western pipe layer to locate a 12-inch cast iron pipe buried about three feet in stiff adobe soil, and has saved several days of labor in digging. As described by A. E. Wright, the finder was a magnetized knitting needle fastened to a strand of 10 silk fibers, a miner's dip-needle having been discarded as not sufficiently sensitive. The fibers were glued around the balancing point, and the needle was so balanced as to dip normally about 20 degrees in order that the two ends might be attracted to the pipe unequally. The needle was mounted in a cigar box, with an index card, and a glass cover as wind shield. When used, the box was placed horizontally on the ground in a north and south direction, and was moved across the supposed line of the pipe, readings being taken every two feet, and in this way the location was determined very accurately. The deflection was twice as great over a bar as over the mid-length of a pipe. Blaugas, the liquid illuminating gas of Prof. Blau, seems to be gaining favor in Germany, where it is made. Burned four hours a day, a 22 pound cylinder supplies a 50 candle power gas burner four months. Flexible copper tubes, only about as large as an electric light wire, connect the burners with the reservoirs.
