rational person claim that it is too religion: cold in any part of the inhabited world, for people who live there, to be immersed in water in the name of the Trinkty? Experience has demonstrated to the contrary. Men and women have been baptized according to Christ's command, from Iceland to the Equator, "from Greenlan1's icy mountains to India's coral strand," and no ill effects from it were ever kuown. But is it not a fact that the introduction of the heresy of infant baptism was the percursor and primil cause of the further heresy of sprinkling in lieu of baptism? Submerging babies publicly in water would naturally become objectionable to parents, and lead to a more convenient and less obnoxious mathod. One change would suggest another. A departure in this respect would pave the way for a further stride away from the Gospel path. The orces-a religion. "Christian liberty" taken in administering an ordinance which required faith and repentance, to an infant incapable of believing and having nothing to repent of, would open the way to still greater "Christian liberty," in the substitution of the application of a little, water for baptism therein. "So lead to more." They had no authority to introduce another ordinance for that which Christ directed, and for which He set the pattern Himself when baptized by John in Jordan. It will be said that it is a trivial matter as to the quantity of water used or the manuer of administering it. But that is only a flippant manner of evading a disagreeable conclusion.
