BLACK JACK.

How Black Jack came to be sent out upon his adventures is best known by so ill-sounding a name, never transpired, and if he ever possessed a civilized, Christian name, no one in these parts ever heard it. He was a man thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the frontier; and simplicity of character, personal courage, and dog-like faithfulness were to him natural gifts.

He was not black, and except that he had upon his skin the ineffaceable marks of sun and wind, would have been more than ordinarily fair. His hair was a reddish brown, and his keen blue eye had that steady and unflinching gaze which beamed in its own honesty without blemish, and vision without flaw.

It was not enough to say merely that Jack was a frontiersman, because in many instances that only excused an accident, and not a character. He had that something about him which, while it can only exist on the border, is yet a part of the man. Though not a negative man, he was one of those of whom a clearer idea can be obtained by saying what he was not, than what he was. There is a whole world in which all the famous and remarkable, and nearly all the disgraceful and mean, transactions of mankind are performed, of which Jack knew nothing.

Women, in all the splendors of pearls and the colour and gowns of the mine, adorned with all the refinements of civilization, and the taste and delicacy born of cultivated life—blond, bewitching, and fearfully and wonderfully made up—he had never even seen. Femininity conveyed no such idea to him. The women he knew were only women in the broad sense in which female is not male. The wharfs and depots of crowded cities, the throng of the pavement and the exchange, the crowd and jam and bustle of trade, broad fields and paved roads, were all crowded out of his conception of life and men, and he had no appreciation and no opinion to dignify concerning them. He had never heard the sound of church bells, and luckily for him, was entirely ignorant of the fatal differences in creeds which exist among those who diligently seek after the truth.

In his ignorance of all that is fashionable, and most that is bad, among civilized mankind, he was even ignorant of the praises and luxuries men sometimes earn by dying; and the velvet turf and shaded aisles, the fair monuments and glittering epitaphs, of Greenwood or Forest were to him but mere abominations. His was the rock-piled and lonely grave of the wilderness, and he never dreamed that a palace was necessary to the welfare of a moulderling day.

If the schoolmaster was ever abroad in Western Arkansas, where Jack first saw the light, the benign influence never reached his mind. He could not read, was innocent of the primary rules of arithmetic, and everything else in the way of books. The immense literature of fiction and newspaperdom was something he had hardly heard of—and yet, the fact is stated as a remarkable one, that he could traditionally recite all of Watt's hymns, and could repeat them with the same emotion and pathos with which the childish and immortal lines are repeated by nearly all who speak the English tongue.

But Jack was not a grown-up child. He lacked none of the grand essentials which go to make up the curious biped whose ancestor was an ape and whose future is—doubtful. He spoke the mother tongue with a fluency equal to the requirements of his life, and he spoke and strengthened it with that piquant vocabulary which is so much in vogue now that it is said it is vulgar to use it. His most peculiar characteristic, however, was not an educational one. It consisted in the almost total absence of personal fear. Whole armies of men, surging masses which number many thousands, may, and often do, go through a long day of carnage without any instance of cowardice. But this is not the kind of courage he possessed. He limped, had lost a finger, and carried an ugly scar on his cheek. But all these had been obtained in a redoubtable one, his last and traditional one, a skirmish of Watt's hymns, and could repeat them with the same emotion and pathos with which the childish and immortal lines are repeated by nearly all who speak the English tongue.
