

WORK! WORK! WORK!

FROM 1839.
Tis the song that the nations sing.
The wheel and the spoke and the tiresome yoke.
The dusts that clog and the duds that choke.
And the sparks as they upward spring.

Tis the song that the mighty sing.
The braw that wets with the daily sweats.
The back will bent to life's load of debts.
And the groan as the hammers swing.

Tis the song that the consumer sings.
The strength and the force of the heart-deep source
That marks progression's untiring course
And heaps life's rare harvests.—

NOTES

THE story of the illustrating of "The Flute of the Gods," a new novel by Marsh Ellis Ryan, just published by Stokes, is as interesting as many works of fiction. Mrs. Ryan has been writing with the Indian among the scenes of her novel in southern Arizona for two summers. The picturesqueness of the country and the people had made a deep impression upon her, as is shown in her novel. It seemed to her that she must be next impossible for her work to have illustrations which would give any idea of the wonderful things that she saw.

By chance there fell into her hands a copy of Scribner's Magazine containing an appreciative account of the Indian photographs by Edward S. Curtis, together with some reproductions. She took up the work at once that she might persuade Mr. Curtis to illustrate her novel. Her dream could be realized.

She at once started on a long and arduous journey to Seattle, where Mr. Curtis was, but arrived too late to him. From there she rode north to Canada, then to New York, and finally to him. Now Mr. Curtis is an extremely busy man, as, among other things, he was issuing, at the bidding of Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, "The North American Indian," a monumental work costing $4,000 and a set. All he could tell Mrs. Ryan was that "he was not a great writer." But the tide of critical feeling is now running overwhelmingly in his favor. A new biography by Edward Thomas has been published in England. A new edition of some of his essays has appeared in this country, supplementing the earlier publications of Thomas B. Mosher. The Edinburgh Review, in a lengthy analysis, sums him up as "the possessor of a grit of the rarest order."

He is in England what Thoreau is in America," an critic declares. The characterization is at the same time suggestive and misleading. With Thoreau's intense enthusiasm for nature and genius in delineating its modes, Jeffries has, indeed, much in common. There is also in both an intellectual intensity, a degree of philosophic insight, that belongs only to minds of the first order. In other points, however, the two present a contrast rather than likeness. Jeffries is rather a pagan; Thoreau is more of a Puritan—Current Literature. (November) of the illustrations, however, though few at length compare even more than justified Mrs. Ryan's expectations. On account of the remarkable beauty, which could not be satisfactorily reproduced by half-tones, they were copied by the engraving process, and now stand as a notable part of Mrs. Ryan's book.

Robert Barr, whose Cardigan has just been published by Stokes, is well known as one of the most popular authors of the day. His list of successive novels include such titles as "Ariadne," "A Woman's Interven," "Over the Border," etc. Mr. Barr was years ago known only as a humorist, and newspaper writer. His ingenuity of plot is well illustrated by an anecdote which he tells of himself.

"He visited a national political convention at Chicago as correspondent for his newspaper, leaving generally given away his admissions to the press. He was so anxious to get into the building. At length he went to a neighboring shop, borrowed a tattered coat and a pair of oversalls, and with an old pall full of sloshy water walked triumphantly past the doorkeeper, who thought he was an attendant. He meant to keep the pall as a souvenir, but it became torn in the crowd."

Mr. Barr has many interesting anecdotes, but many capacious. His recent years have been spent as editor of "The Idler," and he has devoted most of his time to the writing of short stories. Now, however, he has gone back to novels, and "Cardigan" is a splendid example of his ability in this direction.

BOOKS

The Winning Lady is the title of the new volume by Mary E. Wilkins Freeman.

Many of the stories in this latest volume by Mrs. Freeman are in lighter vein than her longer novels or some of the earlier tales which made her famous. Yet, though they sparkle with comedy, they are by no means lacking in that serious and tender humanity which illuminates all that this author has written.

Mr. Barr has had many interesting experiences, but many capacious. His recent years have been spent as editor of "The Idler," and he has devoted most of his time to the writing of short stories. These are the sort of stories that most people laugh and cry over. They will be warmly welcomed by all the many devotees of Mrs. Freeman's work.

Beginning with European contests affecting America, and recounting the earliest conflicts like Champlain's battle with the Iroquois and the Pequot war, the narrative continues through colonial days, the Revolution, war of 1812, Mexican and Civil wars, to the final conflict of the land and water campaigns at Santiago. over a road leading through lands of many colors, peopled with odd characters, and surcharged with adventures suitable for the minds and imaginations of young children. Is the story of the emerald city of Oz a delightfully characteristic story? Year after year this children's favorite inventive genius in the master of characters his whimsical humor, dry wit and amazing plots are in exact balance and form the cornerstones of his tremendous success.

Mr. Baum's original "Wizard of Oz" contains a chapter of the author's own experiences in arriving at the Emerald City. This required her going through various fairy lands of different colors and different people. The new book for 1909 is "The Road to Oz" which comes nearer than any other to going over the ground of the original "Wizard of Oz." Therefore, in order to realize the various scenes in the different lands through which this road leads, it is necessary to wear tinted glasses. The book forms a complete and practical treatise on Agriculture, Horticulture, Forestry, Landscape Gardening, Animal Husbandry, Stock Feeding, Roads and Roadbuilding, and Country Life Conveniences. It is suited for eighth grade of grammar schools, or for reading rooms, and the illustrations are excellent. The book is intended for use in the school room, and contains questions on the text for review, and questions on other books. This volume is the only one that meets the requirements of teachers who desire something practical on the subject of School Agriculture. It is replete with handsome illustrations, and is adapted for use in any part of the United States.
