propagate themselves sporadically. On the contrary, when they occur in a region like that of eastern Nevada, where there are telegraph lines in all directions, and particularly when the intelligence is transmitted to all parts with such singular celer-ity, we think it in order to inquire whether it may or may not have been anybody's interest to get up either a real Indian war or a big scare. Unfortunately for the general credit it is much easier to comprehend how a real war should be provoked than to comprehend the reasons for getting up a scare. For history abounds with cases in which Indian troubles have been fomented for the express purpose of making a market for fodder and cattle. It is alleged, and not without plausibility, that this was done in the Modor war and that sundry in the Modoc war, and that sundry hard-headed old settlers instigated the difficulty for the purpose of feathering their nests. It happens that there are plenty of ranchers in the valleys of eastern Nevada who may have hay and cattle which hang heavy on their hands. Or it is not beyond the bonds of redibility that some enterprising traders in the towns may have yearned to dispose of their dead stock to Uncle Sam at a handsome advance. Or some horse dealers may have put their heads together and calculated the prospective profit of furnishing mounts for the militia and perhaps a squadron or two of cavalry. All, or any of these things may have occurred to bring about the panic; and it must be confessed that any of them is more probable than that the panic

Late accounts from eastern Nevada seem to show that the first reports of the Indian rising were greatly exaggerated; in fact, at this moment it seems almost doubtful if there were any facts upon which to base those sensational and alarming yarns. And since there is apparently no good reason to fear anything in the form of a general Indian outbreak, it becomes interesting to know how and why this panic was produced. We do not favor the theory that such matters propagate themselves sporadically.

On the contrary when they occur entally struck another little fellow inconvenience.
