EVENING NEWS.

Friday. - January 12, 1877.

Good Wives and Good Husbands.

The following is from the Chicago Alliance—

THE BLESSING OF GOOD WIVES.

No companion so valuable and safe can a man have as a discreet and godly wife. It is her province and care to make her home neat and attractive in appearance; genial, sweet and healthy in atmosphere—the place to which her husband shall turn with glad and longing heart. It is her aim to be, in person and manner so engaging, in spirits so fresh, in affection so genuine and true, in thought so elevated and pure, that she shall desire his companionship with never-failing zest and joy. And it is by such companionship that such a sweet and refined woman molds and fashions her husband to a grace and worth, to him attainable in no other way. Her delicate sense seizes upon, and unconsciously elevates, his esthetic nature. He grows up toward her standard of good taste. The gentleness of her spirit woos the slumbering nobility of his nature to the fortune of life, and makes him great in the strength of manly tenderness. Her piety, more simple, trustful and steadfast than his, sweetly holds him to truth, to duty, and to God. Her grace of manner gently smooths away masculine roughness and angularity. A most mighty wielder of the moral pruning knife is a judicious wife. One by one, eccentricities and rudeness is from the outer life, excrescences and vicious growths from the inner life, are cut away, until the man, in character and conduct, is rounded and complete.—The Monday Club.

THE BLESSING OF GOOD HUSBANDS.

No companion so valuable and safe can a woman have as a discreet and upright husband. It is his province and care to make his home attractive and, as far as means honestly acquired allow, elegant in appearance, cheerful, sweet and healthful in atmosphere, (don't believe any place could be sweet where tobacco abounds) the place which the glad and loving wife finds dearest on earth. It is his aim to be, in person and manner so engaging, in spirits so fresh, in affection so genuine and true, in thought so elevated and pure, that she shall desire his companionship with never-failing zest and joy. And it is by such companionship that a refined gentleness (we "were gentle among you," said St. Paul, as the highest expression of praise) molds and fashions his wife to a grace and worth that she, shut out by family cares from his daily opportunities for improvement, can acquire in no other way. He seizes upon and almost unconsciously elevates her esthetic nature. She grows up towards his standard of good taste. The gentleness of his spirit woos the slumbering nobility of her nature to the fortune of life and makes her great in the strength of true, womanly tenderness. His piety, more logical and steadfast than hers, tones down her more emotional nature, and substitutes for blind feeling notions of truth and duty. His grace of manner gently smooths away the roughness and angularity that almost inevitably come from constant contact with petty and wearing cares, avocations into which little variety can enter. A mighty wielding of the moral pruning knife is the judicious husband. One by one, the eccentricities and rudeness developed by daily intercourse with ignorant or vicious servants and cheating tradesmen, the excrescences brought out by overlong duty in the nursery or anxieties over measles, scarlatina, and all the countless ills that baby-flesh is heir to, in one already enfeebled by gestation and lactation, excrescences of which man can have no appreciation except through affection for the sufferer, are cut away, until the wife in character and conduct is rounded and complete.—The Friday Club

FOREIGN FUNERALS.—As I have said, though in a different sense, they make much of their dead abroad. I was struck by the contrast the day we reached home. Driving from the steamer, we encountered a hearse straggling down Broadway. It attracted as much reverential attention as would be paid to an ice-cart.

I happened to witness a picturesque funeral in Venice. It was that of a chorus boy, in a church on one of the smaller canals somewhere west of the Rialto. I stumbled on the church accidentally that forenoon, and was not able to find it again the next day—a circumstance to which the accident perhaps owes the fairy-like atmosphere that envelops it for me. The building had disappeared, like Aladdin's palace, in the night.

They were performing a mass as I entered. The great rose window behind the organ and the chancel windows were darkened with draperies, and the colossal candles were burning. The coffin, covered with heavily embroidered pall, stood on an elevated platform in front of the magnificent altar. The inlaid columns glistening in the candle-light, the smoke of the incense curling lazily up to the frescoed dome, the priests in elaborate robes, kneeling around the bier, —it was like a masterly composed picture. When the ceremonies were concluded, the coffin was lifted from the platform by six young friars and borne to a gondola in waiting at the steps near the portals. The priests, carrying a huge golden crucifix and several tall gilt torches, unlighted, crowded into the bow and stern of the floating hearse, which was attached by a long rope to another gondola occupied by oarsmen. Following these were two or three covered gondolas, whose connection with the obsequies was not clear to me, as they appeared to be empty. Slowly down the narrow canal, in that dead stillness which reigns in Venice, swept the sombre flotilla, bearing its unconscious burden to the Campo Santo. The air was full of fragrant spring scents, and the sky that arched over all was carved of one vast, unclouded turquoise. In the deserted church were two old gromies scraping up the drippings of the wax candles from the tessellated pavement. Nothing except time is wasted in Italy.—Atlantic Monthly.
