EARLY GARDEN CROFS.

EARLY GARDEN CROFS. A writer in Vick's Magazine suggests that 'most of us can sow some garden peak with profit, but in many localities this will not need to be done until De-comber. At all events, it should not be dona until just before the ground freeezs up. Select a warm sunny spot, free from the danger of washing by winter rains, or the other extreme of water standing on the ground. Earlich the ground as much as possible and use only the extra early smooth varieties. The wrinkled sorts, while better as to yield and flavor are less hardy and would very likely prove disappointing for fall sowing. Do not to exceed an inch, but mulch them quite heavily to protect from to sever freezing as also to obviate the danger of heaving by the freezing and thawing of the early spring. When this is over and not before, remove the mulching and I think the early starting of the peak will be gratifying. Today your correspondent drove out on what is known as "the ridge," ex-tending some 15 miles south of town. The entire landscape is covered with a thick coat of fine, soft, dry grass, at the roots of which in some places the green is pushing its tender tops up-ward, as if it would just take a peep from its cosy bed to see if this warm wind is not the breath of spring. Should the gale veer into the north we shall expect the "winter king" to pay us another of his flying visits; he always demands universal homage; but Today your correspondent drove out always demands universal homage; but rarely remains so long that the tribute o him is devastating.
