Mrs. Florence Kelley, in her address before the Massachusetts Federation on the subject of the "Present Growth of Child Labor in the United States," spoke of the enlightened attitude of the people of the state in keeping factory inspection out of politics, so that the laws regulating child labor can be and are rigidly enforced. But the capitalists who are anxious to keep Massachusetts children out of the factories have no hesitation about sending them where the laws are less rigid. "From Massachusetts," said the speaker, "capitalists go into other states and take advantage of the laws there. This applies also to New York, where capitalists go to Georgia, where child labor is employed. One firm has been obliged to give up manufacturing a style of goods in New York because it cannot compete with child labor in Georgia." The speaker concluded by asserting that unless the consciences of women asserted themselves in the matter, it would not be long before more children would be employed in factories and other commercial pursuits than ever before.

The League of Parents' clubs is a comparatively new association in Chicago. The movement is an outgrowth of the school extension idea, or the opening of the school building for social purposes. The clubs which make up the league are many of them simply mothers' meetings, with afternoon sessions, but others are parents' clubs, and hold their meetings in the evenings in the assembly halls of the public schools. A certain rental is paid to cover the expenses for heating, lighting, and janitor service in the evening. The halls are given free for afternoon meetings, the object of the league is to bring the home and school into closer relation. The members of the school buildings to the public is also advocated.

Many Massachusetts clubwomen are interested in the Howland bill to substitute life imprisonment for capital punishment, and several are speaking for its support.
