THE OVER-BODICE OF EMBROIDERED NET.

Many of the gowns being planned for after-Easter receptions have these little bodices, which, like boleros, set over the high-waisted skirt. These bodices, as will be seen in the photograph, are very plainly built and carry simple, long lines of the skirt. This gown is of petunia cloth and is fitted faultlessly over the hips, the folds trailing gracefully about the feet. The little bodice is of heavy ecru net embroidered with petunia pink motifs and bronze and copper threads. The hat is in the bronze tones and has two pink roses under the brim at one side.

TRISH LACE IS ALWAYS IN FASHION.

The rich character of the heavy hand-made Irish laces make them-like the costly points-always correct in style. The Irish lace blouse of this season is mounted over a white slip of chiffon or thin silk, and, of course, it has long sleeves to the wrist. No matter how handsome a blouse one may own, if it has elbow sleeves it had much better be laid aside to awalt a more propltious season, for just now the long sleave is imperative. This lace blouse looks quite simple at first giance, but a closer study will reveal the vandyked motifs of baby Irish lace, which are set into the top and bottom of the front and across the top of the sleave. The contrast of these finer motifs with the very heavy pattern of the blouse adds greatly to the value of this lace gar-
