WHY FUR IS COSTLY.

Much Work and Patience Needed to Transform the Pelts Into

THERE is a vast difference between the crude skin furnished by the trapper and the finished for of the gravitation and the finished of the gravitation and the finished of the workers. fur of the garment supplied by the furrier. Which of the many women who love to draw the soft, warm for acrass their rosy cheeks would touch even with the tips of their dainty fingers the coarse and ororous pelt as it first reaches the fur market?

The story of the hunting down of the animal has been dispatched is to remove the skin, stretch it on a board to dry after liberally rubbing it with salt to preserve it. The salt is rubbed on the inner side, not on the fur. This is left to dry, and when the hunting season is over all the pelts are gathered into bundles and taken to the nearest market, and eventually they reach New York, the great hearquarters for all raw skins.

Here they are classified, All sealskins of first quality are sent to London for dyeing and unhairing, for seal is covered with a thick coat of coarse gray

MUCH WORK NECESSARY.

Before any skin can be made into a garment it must go through many processes. The first thing is to scrape off all the dried flesh and fat adhering to the pelt and work the leather into flexibility. All peits, after having been scraped are tanned to make the skin tough. The skins are put into vats and tanned until they are finished, and then dried, rubbed, scraped and dyed. The best are done in London, but many more common pelts are dyed in Brooklyn, where there is a large establishment. All furs that are to be made up in "natural" fashion, are after tanning worked over and made as soft as a kid glove, and this is done by sheer strength and patience.

The natural furs are then matched in bunches and tagged with papers showing quality and number. It requires many of them to make a garment. Mink, sable, marten, otter, and similar animals are simply dressed othat is, scraped, rubbed and made for the maker of garments, they are stand pliable. They are never dyed. Seal, skunk, fox, racoon, nutria, musk-rat, rabbit, opossum and some bear are dyed. Racoon has long hairs and a dyed. Racoon has long hairs and a long hairs and a dyed. Racoon has long hairs and a long hair a long hairs and a long hairs a dyed. Racoon has long hairs and a beautiful coat of inner fur closely resembling beaver. It is plucked and the fur used undyed to imitate beaver for collars, capes, etc. Lately the furriers have taken to dyeing it black without unhairing it, and opposum as well, leaving the long hairs. It is used to make tails of. Muskrat makes the best imitation of sealskin.

OTTER MOST EXPENSIVE.

With the exception of sea otter, sable is the most expensive fur. This first is very rare, indeed, and brings over $1,000 for a single pelt. Sable comes from Siberia, through Russia; comes from Siberia, through Russia; but we never see the best and finest of these skins, as they are perquisites of the crown, and the emperor has the first choice of all the output. Sables take the place of diamonds in Russla, and personal wealth is measured in sables as others measure theirs in precious stones.

A sable skin is rarely ten inches long aside from the tail, and they cost $250 apiece, and more, according to quality and supply. They are all stamped with the royal seal of Russia. The sable is remarkable for the richness and length of the fur and the fact that it can be blown any way. It is dark brown, rather darker along the back. A set of sables of reasonable dimensions here would cost from $10,000 to $15,000.

for making up, velvety and rich. It would be difficult to go hunting around among 20,000 or 30,000 skins to find exact matches if one were in a hurry, for all skins used in one garment must be of exactly the same length and shades, so they are carefully chosen and matched as they come from the dyers. Other bins contain ermine and sables.

ALL SCRAPS SAVED.

To the unsophisticated eye a fur gal-ment appears to be all of one piece, without seam or fold, but the inside would show the patient and painstakwithout seam or fold, but the inside would show the patient and painstaking labor bestowed upon it. In the first place, every piece must have the pile run the same way, and be exactly the same in color and thickness.

One of the good points about a fine garment is the small number of piecer that go to make it up. The reason for this is that they are cut without stint. However, every scrap of fur is valuable, and sooner or later finds its place, Cheap fur garments are made of the leavings of the good ones. One piece of Persian lamb three-quarters of a yard square was made up of scraps, none over half an inch wide. The back was a labyrinth of seams, while the face looked as smooth as if of one piece. Obviously, in the process of wear some of these seams are likely to give way. When a garment is to be made the first move is to select the skin. This is laid out on a flat board and wet. The fur side is down. Then they are stretched and When the skins are all prepared, ready is down.

pulled to the limit, and literally thousands of fine, long pins are stuck in to hold the edges. They are left all night to dry. The next day the patterns of stiff cartridge paper are fastened down over the skin firmly, and the cutter, with a knife as sharp as a razor, cuts along the edge of the pattern into the leather, but never quite through, for fear of injuring the fur. When this is done, the parts are gently pulled apart, and the fur is ready to be sewed.

HAND WARK THE BEST.

There are machines to sew fur, but the best work is always done by hand. The edges of the seam are moistened so that the needle will pass, and all seams are moistened and pressed flat, generally with a smooth shell. When the garment is sewd it is stretched again, this time on a model, fur side in, and then all edges are taped, and all seams are stayed by having tape stitched back and forth so the seam is firmly held, no matter what future pressure may come upon it.

Around the top and bottom the tapes are stitched, this last being to give a hold for the lining. Around the armedge is quilted a half-moon of buckram. This is quilted tailor fashion to the leather. Another piece is quilted to the revere. A tailor would scarcely put so many or such careful stitches in the ilnest coat.

The next day the patterns of stiff cartridge paper are fastened down over the skin firmly, and the cutter, with a knife as shave the patterns of the lining of the jacket is then put in.

Among all the reasonably priced furs skunk easily takes the lead for beauty and general utility. The fur-of this animal is prepared by interment in the ground 24 hours, after which it is tan-ped and dyed ned and dyed.

Dyeing is necessary, because there are always white stripes, and the fur is in different shades of dark brown in the natural state. The skunk is of the same family as the Russian sable, and so near does the likeness come that dealers call skunk "Alaska sable." This fur has one neculiarity, and that is fur has one peculiarity; and that is that the long hairs are prismatic in sunlight. This fur, soft and feathery, is beautiful for borderings and neck
