

NEWS' SUPPLEMENT.

GREAT SALT LAKE CITY, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1864.

[From Banner of Light.
SUNSHINE,

OR,
ONE OF KATIE ROBERTS DAYS.

A poor miserable life they lived down in Sawmill hollow, those Roberts. There were six of them. First, the old grandfather, who seemed to know nothing but just the best way to make other people uncomfortable. He was always complaining, and talking about his aches and pains, and the bad weather. He thought that all the trouble that he had was caused by the weather. The wind was always "getting round North," which he thought the unlucky point of the compass.

Then there was Mr. Roberts himself, who thought of but little but the saw-mill and the best way to tend it, and who would be the next President.

Robert and James, or Bob and Jim, as they were called, were his sons, and they were rough boys who liked to fish in the brook better than to go to school, and to run away and have a day's fun better than to help their father in the mill.

Besides these there was the woman to do the work—Sallie by name, who never spoke kindly to any one, but washed the dishes and swept the rooms as if they were disobedient children that she was obliged to knock about or thresh to make obey her.

Lately, there had come into this family, Catie, a cousin to the boys, a sweet, happy, loving child, whose mother had gone to the spirit home, and whose father had left her to be cared for by some one else.

What could Catie do in such a household as that? every one said who knew of her going; and sure enough what could she do, but learn to fret, like the grandfather, and to sulk like Sallie, and to be rude like the boys? We shall see. For every one, you know, has an influence, and it must be for good or bad.

It was a bright October day, after Catie had been a few weeks in the family and had become accustomed to the ways of its members, when she sat upon the doorstep thinking of something her mother had told her. It was this—"If you let the sunshine of your heart be felt, you can make a glad summer any time." To be like that beautiful October sunshine seemed to Catie very good and very beautiful, and so her heart sent up a little prayer, that was only a wish; but good wishes are our prayers. "I wish I could be like the sunshine," was Catie's prayer; and it came from a sincere, good heart, and a beautiful angel heard it, drawn close to the little girl's side by her love, and this good angel tried to put other beautiful wishes into the heart of the little girl as she sat there in the sunshine, and so she began to think what she could do to make other people happier.

It was a bad place to try in, for it seemed as if there was no chance at all of people's being happy in that house, but as sunshine does not wait for a good time to begin, so love does not, but sheds its blessing continually.

"Oh dear," said the grandfather, coming to the door, "what a frost there was! wind north. I'm half frozen; shut that door Catie. I believe you young folks will be the death of me."

"Oh no, grandpa," said Catie, "I'm going to be the life of you. Just see here what a handful of chestnuts I've gathered, and I'm going to boil them real soft for you. Don't you like chestnuts?"

"Guess I do, when they're boiled, but you can't boil them, Sallie's getting breakfast."

"Indeed, guess you can't, miss, it's late now. Get out of my way!"

"Well, I can set the table for you, and that'll help some, and then I know you'll
