As to age it is noticeable that violent deaths are much more common among men than women, the number averagtwenty the excess is on the part of the females. With men the greater number of suicides happen between twenty and thirty, and fifty-five and sixty-five years of age; while with women, under twenty and between forty-five and lifty-five. A preponderance of the suicides come from the ranks of the unmarried, the widowed and the divorced. The German people lead world in numbers of suicides, and the prevailing method among them and throughout northern Europe is hanging. In southern Europe, in a warmer climate and beneath a fairer sky, they seem to prefer drowning. This is no more strange, however, than is the fact that in our own America we hard-ly ever hear of a case of self-drowning in the winter time; the water is too cold to give any comfort to the act. After drowning and hanging come, in the order of prominence enumerated, fire-arms. wounds, fails from a heigh (a specially prominent past-time in France), poisoning and asplyxia. Men seem to prefer fire-arms; while ladies, fearing to disfigure their beauty and desiring to make the matter as interestingly mysterious as possible to the coro-ner, prefer poisoning, strychnine, Rougk on Rats, or anything at hand in that line being satisfactory.
