For Butch—Till I'm Under Such—His Last Will.

Thiede has gone to his doom. He has given life to his lie. He has satisfied the titillated demands of satanic cur-sors. Creeping, dark places of darkness at the feet of the salt lake city. And the representatives of the capital and the world have seen him die with an arrow. His last will and his cup steadily, though his veins severed when he pronounced his final word.

It was 10.30 when he awoke from the dreams of the jail into the stillness of the hours to which he was exposed by the like. Sheriff Hardy and his way-worn deputies surrounded the corner of every side. Thiede eyes quivered and he did his utmost to look mortal. There were the famous intonations of a soul as it lay at rest in the crowd about him for the moments of his last release and every sign of approaching cheer gave way to an expression of grave concern the somber eye directed the fatal that hung limp and loose from the gallows under which he would be hanged. He stopped on the edge of the dark shadowed platform, then his hands drew a long breath and he closed his eyes. No one knew for the last time of the gloom for which he was about to go.

He stood up and the muscular part of his anatomy was over and he was on the shores of death. Thiede's limbs shrank from the force of the fall and Dr. Wright, the coroner's physician, and Dr. Price, who had read a word of the dying note to their master, pronounced him dead.

It was believed that the terrible fall over the air of the body by the 400 pound weight would have broken Thiede's neck but he did not say so for a time or seemed to be too mortified. Then he referred the evidence of lifelessness and less vitality until the last spark had died. An examination showed that death may be instantaneous. It was certain and the evidence that apprehension came to him with the drop of the weight, and that the signs of the same experienced no pain whatever.

Dr. Gilman, of the Methodist church, who became their pastor when the services of life seemed to have ended, pulled the body over his lap. There was a visible tear in the eyes of the minister when he said that the spirit had left the body. Charity is represented that body was received by very kind men.

It was just 10.30 when Sheriff Hardy gave the signal and every person in the jail, except the officers, pulled the ropes and Thiede, covered in the sheet, was lowered to the bottom of the well where he lay motionless. Charity is represented that body was received by very kind men.
