A notable lecture was given in New York lately by Mrs. Carle Chapman Carr, upon which an exchange comment as follows:

An address on "American Homes" was given by Mrs. Carrie Chapman Carr before the Brooklyn Woman's club at its regular meeting on Monday afternoon. It was one of those speeches, occasionally made, which seem an inspiration and more than one of the large audience to which it was spoken expressed genuine regret that no notes being used or taken; the talk can live only in the memory of those within reach of the speaker's voice. Mrs. Carr showed among other things that the "new woman," so called, has not made herself, but is the creation really of a progress of events for which man is chiefly responsible. All her occupations to which in the various phases of the country's growth she has devoted herself with faithful energy, have one by one been taken from her by successive generations and material changes with which all are familiar. Not less radical has been the change that has taken place in her mentality through the influence of a wider and higher education, not only that to which she has access through special avenues but that of the broadening influence which has come to the modern woman, as it has come to the modern man, by modern research and thought. Through the influence of the modern woman, the woman of the future, of rapid development, woman has groped her way, perhaps somewhat unsteadily, but the speaker had faith that it had been and would continue to be an advance which would help her to meet the needs of the future. This main thought was interpenetrated with many practical and helpful side lights, with flashes of humor, and with bursts of eloquence which held the audience breathless.

Mrs. Carr believes that American homes are founded on too deep a principle to deteriorate. They have changed from the family completeness and sufficiency unto itself of colonial days to the dependence upon the outside world of the modern day. They are likely to change more in surface matters and in material surroundings, but the home instinct cannot be uprooted and the utility of the family life will be recovered. The speaker sees one danger imminent, which the thinking woman of the day should exert herself to avert. This is the serious possibility of the average woman mentally and intellectually outgrowing the average man. The pitiless competition in which the average man plunges as soon as he reaches manhood exhausts his mental and physical energies in its pursuit. Women should help him in every way possible, by simplifying the material side of life, by aiding him in bearing the financial burden of the family, if that is necessary, and certainly by elevating him out of the "thing-life" into the "thought-life" as often as she is able. An informal reception to Mrs. Carr followed the meeting.

The mothers' meeting was held at College hall Wednesday evening at 7:30. Mrs. Ida S. Dusenberry presided. Prof. Brimhall lectured, his subject was "Great Women," which was enjoyed as are all of the gentlemen's talks. The program was concluded with some musical selections.
