water and the water produced by melting snow on high land, sinks into the soil until an impermeable stratum is reached. Then it follows that stratum as the same tends downward, thus producing subterranean rivers or brooks. When a well is dug this underground water is sought for; but when the water itself comes to the surface, then the source is commonly known as a spring. In both cases, however, the water flows along a slope higher of course at the point of departure than at the point where the water is obtained. But during its out much faster than it will fill.

the water, from well to original source, there is an equilibrium of air pressure. M. Donet's plan is to the level of the soil, and consequently, when a pump is needed, then the source is no better than an ordinary well. There is a way, however, of increasing the flow of springs by the aid of a simple si-phon, which has been devised by M. Chefdebien. At the point where the spring emerges make an air-tight tank, having a close cover, into which insert a pipe. Bend by following the downward trend of the land, the end reaches a level, say six feet lower than that of the spring level. Now, apply a pump and draw water through this tube. It thus becomes a siphon (the pump is at once removed), and the water continues to flow under the influence of a portion of the atmospheric pressure equivalent to the difference
