

THE PROVO RIVER.

Treat—Herring—Hatch—Out of Date.

One of the most beautiful rivers in Utah is that of Provo. Along almost the highest peaks of the Uintas, it winds its way through magnificent forests, hills and mountains, till it reaches Utah Lake. It is the home of an unlimited supply of the delicious mountain trout and herring, and with mountains to supply this food and the fish to supply the people, as long as the river lasts, provided the law in regard to the use of glass powder be enforced. It, however, the reckless destruction by powder has permitted to continue. I understand it has been ordered on up to the present, but many years will have passed away when the fishy hills will be herring hills, and the river will be a mere stream, and not that interesting source of food, as well as a most important source of life, will have become a thing of the past. All of this is due to the fact, and should be pointed out by those having authority to prevent the destruction. In riding from Park City towards this beautiful stream, an interesting account was brought to me in view of the actual destruction of the fish. In the distance, there the river bottom, all undisturbed with pine, spruce, fir, and aspens, looking so beautiful and so healthy, and so happy to the sight that the very soul is intrigued and enraptured by the purity and beauty. One way to the river is to take the road to the river bottom, and then to the river. The river is a beautiful stream, and the fish are a beautiful sight. The river is a beautiful stream, and the fish are a beautiful sight.
