

NO WAY TO FREEDOM.

This is no way to freedom: to smite down
Some unoffending head that wears a crown—
Only to set it on a sterner brow.
Not I of those who dream the world's release
Will come by the soft processes of peace.
Or the pacific compromise of power;
And when at last dawns the stern, bloody hour,
When the slave stands with rifle in hand
And sweeps the master from the stolen land,
I too would hold a rifle in my hand.
But when that day dawns we shall fight like men,
Glad men that laugh because at last they see
So close the blazing eyes of those they hate—
In honesty of hate his life is ours,
His death or ours in honesty of hate,
We shall not sting an unsuspecting heel,
Or fire into an unprotected breast:

JAMES X. FERGUSON.

It is nearly thirty years since James X. Ferguson, the stockbroker, familiarly known as "Jim," looked like this. It will be seen that he was a handsome fellow even in his youth, and friends of today will admit that time has dealt generously with him in this particular.

This is no way to freedom—it were best
Another hundred years to wait and
Then flash into the sun the fearless steel.

GREEN SKY.

Green in the west;

Swifts in the nest.

Over the fledglings a breast.

MY DREAM.

Sleeping or waking, I'm dreaming a dream.
Dreaming a dream of thee;
From realms of bliss supreme
There come sweet thoughts to me;
Raptures mild o'er my senses steal.
Fair is the face and form I see,
There's a voice I hear, a touch I feel—
A dream, oh I dream of thee!

A precious head on my shoulder lies,
Sweet lips are pressed to mine;
I fondly gaze into love-lit eyes,
My heart throbs close to thine;
Across my path no shadows fall,
No wild wind sweeps life's sea—
Sweetheart, my joy, my life, my all,
My dream is a dream of thee.

Daily and nightly, life is a dream,
A glimpse of heaven to me;
Though the spell were lost in fate's cold stream,
Faint ne'er the fond memory!
Until the hour of life's setting sun,
Through eternal years to be,

are overcome by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Miss Menard cured after doctors failed to help her.

"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound cured me after doctors had failed, and I want other girls to know about it. During menstruation I suffered most intense pain low in the abdomen and in my limbs. At other times I had a heavy, depressed feeling which made my work seem twice as hard, and I grew pale and thin. The medicine the doctor gave me did not do me one bit of good, and I was thoroughly discouraged. The doctor wanted me to stop work, but of course, I could not do that. I finally began to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and felt better after taking the first bottle, and after taking six bottles I was entirely cured, and am now in perfect health, and I am so grateful for it."—Miss GEORGE MENARD, 537 E. 152nd St., New York City.—$5000 forfeit if original of above letter proving genuineness cannot be produced.

school administration. Many persons, therefore, will be profitably interested in the notable paper, by William H. Burnham, upon that subject in the last number of the Atlantic Monthly. Mr. Burnham outlines clearly the leading principles which must be considered in the administration of city schools, the principles inherent in the nature of the school itself and its purpose in society.

Drexel Biddle of Philadelphia announces the publication of a new book, entitled "Bears I Have Met—Others." The author is Captain Allen Kelley, now chief editorial writer of the Philadelphia North American. Captain Kelley is famous in the west as a hunter, sharpshooter, Indian war correspondent, captor of the big grizzly, monarch, and newspaper man of the "get-they" school. The book will be illustrated by Ernest Thompson Seton, Homer Davenport, Nolan, McDougall, Loomis, Hoffer, and other artist friends of the author.

The new series of stories dealing with Sherlock Holmes is to be entitled, "The Return of Sherlock Holmes." It will appear in the Strand in England and in Collier's Weekly in this country. Four of the stories have already been completed by Sir Conan Doyle. The titles of these four are as follows: "The Adventure of the Norwood Builder," "The Adventure of the Dancing Man," "The Adventure of the Solitary Cyclist," and "The Adventure of the Empty House." It is understood that for the American serial rights alone of these new stories Doyle is to receive something not far from $2 a word.

The fact that "Her Ladyship's Elephant" has just gone into its fifteenth edition causes renewed regret for the untimely death of the man who wrote it. The author, David Dwight Wells, son of the late political economist, David A. Wells, based his story upon an incident which actually occurred while he was second secretary of the United States embassy in London under Mr. Bayard. Although Mr. Wells later wrote "His Lordship's Leopard" and "Parous Times," these were books rather of promise than of achievement. He had a broad, well-ordered mind, which finds its fullest expression in his first book, but he had not that result of mental discipline which comes after years of writing, of being plausibly serious.

BOOKS.

A new edition has appeared of "Earth's Enemies," by Charles D. Roberts. It includes three new stories, entitled "The House at Stony Lonesome," "The Hill of Chastisement," and "On the Tantram." The book, which promises to be popular with the older readers of this author's many fervent admirers. To those who have not yet made his acquaintance it should be said that most of the stories in the collection attempt to present one or another of those problems of life or nature to which, as it appears to many of us, there is no final solution within sight. Others are almost literal transcripts of dreams, while another category of the tales are founded on scenes from the simple life of the Canadian backwoods and the country, with which the earlier years of the author have made him familiar. Mr. Roberts is thoroughly in touch with nature and the demands of the woods. He has a certain sympathy for even the more ferocious of the carnivorous beasts and birds, and is capable of arousing it to more limited extent in the breast of his readers. Added to this his style is correct and simple. The result is delicious to those who can enter with him in communion with nature and the more primitive instincts of men. The volume is illustrated and clearly printed on paper of superior quality.

"The Vulgarians," whom Edgar Fawcett presents to the public are the three younger members of a western family that has been inundated by wealth. He transfers them from their native town to New York city, where their inexperience is corrected by a young widow of refinement, the "girls" proving apt pupils, but their brother being for some time more recalcitrant to the best usage of metropolitan life. The title of the story is misleading, for the young people are candid and simple, rather untutored than vulgar, which is evident from the first part of the tale, but as there is only the semblance of a plot this quality tires in the reading and before the book is more than half perused interest in it begins to die out.

At the door of churches in which members of the Paulist Order hold their mission to non-Catholics it is the custom of the priests to place a box in which their hearers are invited to deposit their difficulties and objections. These are answered on the following evening. It is such questions and replies that Rev. Bertrand L. Conway of the Paulist Fathers has incorporated in the book to which he has given the appropriate title of "The Question Box Answers." In it the doubts of the agnostic, the misconceptions of the Protestant and the ignorance of the Catholic as to the doctrine, discipline and history of the great church of western Christendom are met by one whose wide knowledge of his subject and eminent skill in religious controversy are evident from perusal of the work. Some of the questions appear almost futile, while others are so good as to rival the exercise of the highest gifts of intellectuality, but whether of one of the other class, the queries propounded and the replies made thereto cover the entire field of Catholic doctrine and practice in concise form and in language appropriate to lay inquirers.

Stewart Edward White, the author of "Conjuror's House," "The Bazaar," "The Auctioneer," "Phillips & Company," declares that a western express company owes him the price of one shave. The alleged indebtedness arose a few weeks ago in this way: Mr. White and his companions had been traveling through a forest section in the un-mapped part of the Sierra Nevada mountains, had been far from civilization, and with enough for food, Mr. White to have acquired a beard of some thickness. When the party arrived at a small town where civilization began again, Mr. White found awaiting him the express company's notice that a parcel had arrived for him at their office. It was a valuable parcel, Mr. White knew and he went immediately to get it. "I'm sorry you haven't seen me," said the man at the desk, when the dust-covered bearded traveler presented himself. "You'll have to be identified." Though his wrath rose at the implied questioning of his honesty, White set about producing proof. He showed letters addressed to him, poured out the contents of his purse, which included a soiled visiting card—but the clerk would not be won. Scarcely defeated White returned to his friends to take counsel. The result was the unearthing from the baggage of a magazine which contained the young writer's picture and with enough for the express office clerk. He viewed the picture with doubt. "I can't say it looks like you, but it might," he admitted. "If you haven't that beard," the adjutantment to the barber shop was made quickly, and when White emerged from the barber's hands the clerk confessed that the identity was established, handing over the express package with profuse apologies. Mr. White accepted the apologies but put in a claim for the price of the shave, which he declared was justly borne by the express company.

In his "History of American Political Theories" (Macmillan), Mr. C. Edwards Macmillan traces the historical development of American political theories from the colonial days down to the present time. The political philosophy of the colonists is first considered, with special attention to the significance of the Puritans. The doctrines of 1776 and their expression in state constitutions is made a subject of investigation, and is followed by an examination of the reaction from these ideas as seen in The Federalist, and in the school of which Adams was the great theoretical exponent. The characteristic doctrines of the Jeffersonian Democracy are carefully analyzed and the further expansion and expression of these ideas in the Jacksonian Democracy is described, the political philosophy of the slavery controversy is examined, and the texts of the pro and anti-slavery parties studied in detail. The development of political ideas in connection with the great conflict over the nature of the Union is discussed at length, and the principles of the great schools of interpretation compared from the standpoint of modern political science. Recent tendencies in political speculation are taken up with the doctrines of the characteristic of earlier days. Throughout the discussion, the various types of political theory are considered in connection with the facts of American history and the intimate relation between the ideas and the environment is strongly emphasized.

Of recent years no country, perhaps, has responded so strongly to the influence of the great masters of realism as has Poland. A Polish writer, Wilhelm Feldman, has recently written a work upon Polish literature of the last 20 years. In it he traces the evolution in Polish letters due to the influence of Ibsen, Zola and Hauptmann.

Arnold Bennett, author of "Anna of the Five Towns," (McClure, Phillips & Co.) declares that heroines of 18 or 20 are too trivial for the novel writer of the day to take up with and shot upon. He says that they were suitable enough to raise the sympathetic sighs of the readers of the early nineteenth century, but that the dignity of the novel writer of the present day requires a more important material than the infantile unhappiness of some childish-minded girl. He is backing up his opinion with parables, and his next novel, upon which he is now engaged, will have for its central figure a woman of 40. From 40 on is the most interesting period of a woman's life," he says. "The average heroine of 20 is by no means so interesting a study as the woman who has lived and reached 40." Mr. Bennett's new novel begins on the heroine's fortieth birthday. She is the mother of two grown daughters, and the action of the story takes place during the year between her fortieth and forty-first anniversary.

As "Golden Pledge" is a sort of international story, it is only natural that it should find a market in England. It is now running serially in one of the English magazines and will appear in book form this fall. The English critic finds the fortune-hunting English earl, seeking an heiress in America, who is the central figure in the novel, a "life-like and amusing character managed without caricature," to quote one of the chief reviewers. David Graham Phillips, the author of "Golden Pledge," is at present in Paris. His new novel, "The Master Rogue," being the confessions of a Croesus," will come out this fall.

With the appearance of the latest "best selling" lists, it is seen that "The Simple Life" still holds its place in prominence in many of the cities. Not since the "best selling list" was devised has any book other than fiction maintained its popularity for so long a period as this quiet plea of Charles Wagner's for more rational standards.

of life. Wagner's new book, "The Better Way," promises to follow in the footsteps of "The Simple Life."

Certain literary statisticians have been computing that Conan Doyle would be the most richly rewarded author in history, had all his works been paid at the record rate quoted for his new Sherlock Holmes stories: $2 per word. Up to and including "The Hound of the Baskervilles," and not counting in "The Adventures of Gerard," which is now running serially, his takings would come to about a million and a half dollars. But Dr. Doyle—or Sir A. Conan Doyle, to give him the title which he does not care to have used in America—has not always received $2 a word or even the hundredth part of that. There is an interesting letter in the possession of an American publisher embodying a proposition from the creator of Sherlock Holmes for a contract on the basis of a cent and a half per word. The least interesting feature is that the contract was declined.
