A COOL HEAD.

The burglars had been very active and held by Cool operations in our city, and the entire community had remained above the alarm for several days, and I had lost of value in my care. I pondered to that that little soul knew my whereabouts, although of my movements rather than my person I posted reflection. If an unnerved great noise for apprehension, and I, all awake, I could hear them and let take whatever he might find.

"This state of things," I reasoned with myself, "cannot possibly continue perhaps violence. If they are so capable, theft and make good their escape without it.

Those were my reflections every night as I undressed and then prayed for rest, but leaving my cards open to the morning. I had been asleep one night about an hour, when I was awakened by the falling of a small object somewhere. Hearing slightly and opening my eyes, I saw the gas slightly turned on a little. Several small articles had been turned down on the bureau. Before the door he stood a tall, broad shouldered man with his back toward me, so that I could not see his face, however, from his size I was satisfied I discovered the value of presence of mind.

Opposite the side of my bed, and about eight feet from it, was the door of my room, two or three feet from which there was a ladder leading to the roof. From within he entered the window. It was some 20 feet from the ground and isolated. My plan was to call to my self, and if he made no effort for escape. I knew the policemen's beat, and he would pass by a short time. Telling both myself them, as I opened my eyes and saw the burglar taking a very unceremonious leave, I made a very pleasant remark to him, though, to tell the truth, I never was more still awake in my life.

"Hello, John! What are you leaving for? Don't you come here and room without saying such a common thing to me?"

The fellow, taken somewhat aback at being addressed in this way, said in a few but meaning voice and pointing a revolver at me:

"Shut up! What do you take me for?"

"I see you be for John." I replied with a well assumed nonchalance. "But I didn't suppose he was after anything valuable in my room, except one thing, and, by the way, you are the gentleman before in the world."

"Both's that?" growled my visitor.

"Well, I have a very good watch, but if you want to get it you must put a shirt to the window and pull it down, for I find what I considered the best, but what now seems the good, fortune to break the spring yesterday and left it for repairs."

"You're a peculiar sort of fellow," he said, without any amount of self-possession.

"What's the use of my getting excited or attempting to resist you? You are armed, and you are two men. And if you have no weapon your fighting weight must be at least 10 pounds more than mine. I'm not a fighting man, and I have no idea of interfering with you. If the room were filled with dynamite I would not lift my finger to save them. Take all you can find. I am going to sleep, and don't make any more noise."

"Hold on!" said the fellow. "Where's your key?"

"I suppose you want to walk as much of it built as you can," I said. "So look in my pants, hanging over the bedpost there, and you'll find my pocketbook with a few shillings in it."

It was hardly time for the policeman to pass, and I resolved to speak. I made up a few moments put my plan into execution.

A glance, quick as lightning, showed me that the key of the door was on the outside.

By listening expressions did not escape the sharp and practical ear of my price relative. It was a curious scene to behold. A sitting in my bed in my nightclothes, unarmed, and this stalwart fellow, pistol in hand, glaring half menacingly, half irresolutely at me and almost to the pounding outlands of a right about to spring upon his prey. But there I said, coolly conversing with him, the no earthly of the situation may be to refer to this article to allow my mare to get the upper hand for an instant.

"What are you humming to?" asked the burglar.

"I thought I heard a cry of fire."

It that instant and in the dead stillness of the night I heard the tramp of the policeman. It was still some distance off.

"You will find," I said, "some clothes of mine in the pantry, and you'll be welcome to the small fat you. Good night. The keys are in the middle drawer."

He turned to the drawer indicated, and, as he did so, with one unconscious bound I cleared the distance between myself and the door, slammed the door and locked it upon him. Oblivious of my nakedness, I sprang to the steps. I had two flights to descend and open the door before I could reach the yard, but it was hardly quicker for him to descend the ladder quite quickly.

Bounding rather than running down stairs, I flung back the bolt and rushed into the yard. He was half way down the ladder as I reached the middle. I seized the ladder at the bottom, and using all my power brought it and the burglar to the ground with a crash. The pistol he held in his hand fell from his grasp. I made a dash for it, and he, scrambling to his feet like a cat, rushed at me, and as I stooped seized me by the nape of the neck. I forced the pistol upward and pulled the trigger.

It merely emptied—there were no more charges in it. With a terrible oath the baffled villain wrenched the weapon from my grasp and aimed a shot at that me what might have proved a fatal blow when there was a rush behind him, and he was felled to the ground. The policemen had heard my shout and was just in time to arrest me.

The burglar was soon secured, and to my sentiment I was released. I know that many I have told when the following with a smile, suggested that I might "catch cold in their clothes."

I then remembered for the first time that I had on my pajamas and had a hasty retreat. With a long chuckle result, I took my fine good night, which I did with a shrewd sense of the humor of the world's author's, after all, from under my pillow, looked at the hour, turned in and after a little while fell asleep.—Exchange.
