

THE DESERET EVENING NEWS.

TRUTH AND LIBERTY

FRIDAY, JUNE 7, 1901. SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

NUMBER 170.

FIFTY-FIRST YEAR

TERRIBLE DEED OF "DUDE BILL."

Handsome Young Indian Shepard Takes the Life of His Stolen Bride and Her Dogs, and Then Kills Himself.

Special Correspondence.

Creek, June 4.—Decorated day was a day of sorrow in this section of the state so far as the Indians are concerned. On that day "Dude Bill," the handsome and proud of his beauty, became a murderer and a suicide. The tragedy was the work of a young man who had given him the life of his Indian bride. The tragedy was the work of a young man who had given him the life of his Indian bride.

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

When the excited Indians and whites

reached the spot they found the two bodies lying close together. Two dogs belonging to the dead bride were also shot. "Dude Bill" having killed them in his frenzy. The sorrow among the Indians is general, and the whites also sympathize with their brethren. "Dude Bill" had been the admirer of all his tribe, and his young wife was beloved by all the young folks of her people, and cherished by the old ones. The two young Indians, the most comely of their tribe, fell in love. But the course of true love seldom runs smooth in the red man's world, being frequently cut upon the breakers as are some of the affairs of the white world. The dusky young lover found himself bitterly opposed by his sweetheart's grandparents and other influential relatives. But the Indian romance again partook of the nature of the white man's and an elopement followed. The happy couple returned to the tribe and found clemency in the hearts of most of those who had opposed them. But the grim old grandfather never relented, and never failed to display his enmity towards "Dude Bill."

The Indians are included in the old idiom, "All the world loves a lover," and the young husband and his wife found plenty of devoted friends to make their pathway easy. Now, after a lapse of only one year their romance ends like many a white couple's romance in a tragedy that reads like the plot of a dime novel. The grief of the Indians is profound, and they can ascribe no cause for the awful deed.

Doctor H. J. Faust, the old Deep Creek veteran, who sends the above story to the "News," says that in forty-eight years of experience among the Indians he has never heard of one of them committing a murder wantonly. Some have killed their squaws but it was out of jealousy. He further says that notwithstanding all the trouble the Indians have given him in the past he cannot but feel sorry for them over the tragic fate of their beautiful bride and her handsome husband.

port to the advisory committee. This latter committee has 500 members. While great secrecy has been maintained concerning the matter, it is believed that they are about evenly divided, and that the sub-committee will turn the matter over to the advisory committee without recommendations as to a report. In connection with the making of the President ineligible for a second term opinions on the length of the single term were requested. It is believed a term of six or eight years is favored.

ROCKEFELLER'S GIFT.

American Medical Association Gratefully Acknowledges It.

St. Paul, June 7.—A gift of $200,000 from John D. Rockefeller for the furtherance of scientific research among medical and surgical lines was gratefully acknowledged by the executive committee of the American Medical Association. The details of the benefaction are not yet known to the executive committee.

THE STRANDED ASSYRIAN.

Three Wrecking Steamers Lying Along Side Her Now.

St. Johns, N. F., June 7.—Three wrecking steamers are lying by the stranded Leyland line steamer Assyrian, ashore off Cape Race, and three divers are making a thorough examination of her bottom. Everything is ready for discharging her cargo or attempting to tow her off, if such a step is decided on. The weather is most favorable and it is likely to continue unchanged for some time.

Detroit Journal Held.

Detroit, Mich., June 7.—The Detroit Journal, of which William Livingston has been editor and proprietor since 1892, has been purchased by a company of local capitalists, and the property was transferred to them yesterday. The new owners are as follows: President, E. D. Stair; vice president, Henry Stephens; secretary and treasurer, Chas. L. Palmer; and Wm. C. Andrews, Dr. J. H. Book and A. L. Stephens.

There will be no marked change in the paper's policy.

Tried to Provoke a Duel.

New York, June 7.—A Herald Rio de Janeiro correspondent says: It is asserted that President Campos Sales will interfere to prevent the passage of the proposals of certain members of congress to increase the duties.

Admiral Mello sent his brother Lycurgo and his nephew, Arthur Mello, to provoke a duel with Deputy Valois Castro, calling him a coward. But Senor Castro declined to accept the challenge as he is a priest.

All Volunteers Have Left.

Washington, June 7.—A cablegram was received at the war department today from Gen. Mac Arthur at Manila, announcing that all the volunteers have left the Philippines en route for the United States.

English Trade Decreases.

London, June 7.—The statement of the board of trade for the month of May shows decreases of $1,449,700 in imports and $1,159,200 in exports.

Gov. Sanford Easier.

Tucson, Ariz., June 7.—Gov. Sanford, who was taken seriously ill here two days ago, is resting easier today. His condition, however, continues serious.

Thrown Off the Blind Baggage.

Sidney, Neb., June 7.—An unidentified man, aged about 25 years, was thrown off the blind baggage of a passenger train on the Union Pacific last night near the Burlington viaduct and was killed outright. Three men, supposed to be his companions, have been arrested, charged with the crime, and are now in jail. The coroner will hold an inquest today.

THE INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. Lawson Offers to Charter the Boat to N. Y. Club Men.

Boston, June 7.—Thomas W. Lawson, the owner of the Independence, in order to conform with the requirements of the New York club an making the yacht eligible for the coming races, has offered to charter the boat to Lewis S. Oyster, a New York club member, and the southern states during the early stages of the reconstruction period are pointed to as being substantially analogous to what is proposed in the Philippines.

Civil administration under military supervision such as is contemplated, is said not to be anomalous and the civil government in New Mexico and the southern states during the early stages of the reconstruction period are pointed to as being substantially analogous to what is proposed in the Philippines.

Five Batteries to be Organized.

Washington, June 7.—An order has been issued at the war department directing the organization of five batteries of field artillery and three companies of light artillery in addition to those now in the service. They will be organized at the following places: Fort Sam Houston, Texas; Fort Sill, Oklahoma; Fort Belvoir, Illinois; Fort Sheridan, Illinois; and Fort Warren, Massachusetts. The batteries will be organized by the following existing organizations: Second, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh and Ninth batteries and the Forty-eighth companies.

Two additional artillery bands also are authorized to be known as the Ninth and Tenth bands, artillery corps. One of the bands will be stationed at Fort Riley, Kansas, and the other at Fort Warren, Mass.

A Duel in the Parc des Princes.

Paris, June 7.—A duel with swords took place this morning between Max Regis (the son of the late mayor of Algiers) and an Algerian journalist named Labedess. After 19 rounds, lasting two hours and a half, with no result the encounter was adjourned until tomorrow.

Regis challenged Labedess in consequence of an article which the latter wrote in La Petite Republique. There was a second duel, simultaneously in another part of the park between a writer on the Temps and another newspaper man. It resulted in the former being slightly wounded in the thigh by a pistol shot.

Golf Player Adams Not Guilty.

New York, June 7.—A verdict of not guilty was returned by the jury at Yonkers that tried Benjamin Adams, a member of the board of education of that place, on the charge of violating the law in playing golf on Sunday.

Banker J. H. Littlefield, Dead.

New York, June 7.—James H. Littlefield, formerly a banker in Houston, Texas, was found dead in bed at his residence in this city. Death was caused by heart disease. He was 68 years of age and came to this city last August after retiring from business.

MRS. MCKINLEY

HOLDS HER OWN.

No Material Change in the Past Twenty-Four Hours.

Washington, June 7.—Mrs. McKinley's physicians were in consultation over an hour this forenoon and at 11:45 o'clock the following statement was issued: "Mrs. McKinley's physicians state that her condition is about the same as reported yesterday. There has been no material change in the past twenty-four hours."

The examination of Mrs. McKinley's blood, which has been made under the direction of the attending physicians, showed negative results, there being no evidence of blood poison. This is only one of the various examinations that are being made by the physicians to determine the character of the illness of Mrs. McKinley. The blood was taken from her arm last Tuesday.

AT THE HOSPITALS.

Wounded Man Brought from Fort Bridger Little Girl's Death.

AT ST. MARK'S—W. W. Lim was brought to Salt Lake from Fort Bridger today and taken to St. Mark's hospital, where he is suffering from a badly shattered arm. Lim, it seems, is a stockman, in his section and is the victim of one of the periodical "misunderstandings" that takes place between the sheep and cattlemen of Wyoming. He became involved in a dispute two or three days ago and received two bullets in his arm with the result that he will probably be amputated tomorrow. There is probably a good story back of the trouble, but the particulars could not be obtained this afternoon. Lim is probably one of the men mentioned in the double column head dispatch from Piedmont in this issue of the "News."

THE HOLY CROSS—Little Hazel Dean, the nine year old daughter of W. J. Dean, the well known Sugar House ward contractor, died at the Holy Cross hospital this afternoon from blood poisoning, caused by appendicitis. She was operated upon on Sunday last, and found to be in a very bad way. Only a shivering hope of recovery, as blood poisoning had already set in. The funeral will take place from the Sugar ward meeting house on Sunday next at 2 p.m.

DR. HOWARD TAKEN ILL.

University Professor Suffers Attack of Nerv