A ROYAL MARRIAGE.

There was a bridal in the palace—the bridal of the eldest and most lovely princess—a girl. In the last of the spring fêtes of exhibition, a beautiful creature, adored in studies, accomplished, and with a powerful alliance had been deemed worthy of a princess so lovely.

Her dress was richly decorated with pearls, that was silk with lace, for her feet and a crown of gold surrounded by a chaplet of orange flowers, rested on her brow. At the altar stood the prince, surrounded by the emperor and empress, the ambassador and court, waiting his expectant the coming of the bride.

"Ah, my daughter," said the empress as the princess approached, "where had she stayed coming?" And he bid her kneel.

The ambassador slowly knelt down, awaiting his nod from the empress, and the princess followed his example nearly unconscious of the presence of the court. Suddenly her eye met those of the ambassador fixed upon her, and, turning deadly pale, she made a sign for his attendant to commence. The ring was placed upon her finger and her small white hand rested for one moment in the ambassador's. The wedding was pronounced, the levée of both were quickly over, and, glancing fondly at the still kneeling bridegroom, the princess rose and left the altar. She paused for a moment in his arms and, turning to the emperor, presented to the court the youthful queen of Germany.

"And now her! Nice she be happy?" was the trotting exclamation of the bridal party left the palace followed by the younger orders of the bride and the grenadier, nearly bursting with pride.

"What! in tears!" said the empress kindly, when her daughter, accompanied by her attendant ambassador, entered the room on her mother's bosom. "This is not right, my child. Trust me, you shall love as we often, and, though absent, we shall never forget you. Let me kiss away those tears, for, hark, I hear sounds—footsteps are approaching."

"I trust your majesty will pardon me," said the ambassador, humbly bowing and so beholding the queen of Germany alone, for the empress had retired. "I was not aware your majesty was here. This pavilion is gratefully deserted."

"So it would be now, but I have come hither to see the sun set for the last time in nine years and not to listen to the sound of my favorite bugle, playing beneath those windows. You cannot blame me."

"My liege lady, I would not dare to breathe a word of disrespect against one so good and beautiful. Believe me, I would die to save you one moment's agony."

"Nay, to life so utterly valueless?"

"Surely, for its only charm is lost?"

"Impossible," said the queen coldly. "You have much to live for—fame, wealth and doubtless love and more. You have in another for whom you would die save me."

"Nay, but one—forgive me, liege lady, but one. She cannot be mine. She is lost forever to me."

"I pity you," said the queen, tears rushing to her eyes. "Is she wedded—this false one? Is she wealthy?"

"Yes, oh, yes, but she was not false! I did not dare to tell my love. I knelt and prayed for strength to wait for happiness. I have asked it for her, but she knows not."

"Were your situations in life equal?" again said the queen.

"No," he answered, "she was far above me—too good, too beautiful for me."

"Ah, had she not been wedded I could have given you rank, wealth equal to hers and bestowed her on you. Should you have been happy?"

"Lady, she did not—could not love me. Judge my feelings when unexpectedly she gave her hand to another. Lady, you do not know my misery."

"How could she tell that?" said the queen, her cheeks turning bright white at the warmth with which he spoke. "If youth was exempt from trials, how could we feel for others' sorrows? If I had none of my own, I could not this night weep with you."

"Trials, lady!" said the ambassador.

"Yes, bitter trials; very bitter, but it is not over them to trouble the ears of my host. Let me bid you to happy and, forever, farewell!"

"Forever, farewell! Why, dearest lady, why? In my wrath I have offended you. Forgive me, I implore. Part not in anger with me, turn and look kindly on me again." And the astonished ambassador caught the fairness of her robe.

"Unhand me, sir! I am not used to such familiarity. Leave me!"

"Not, by my life, I swear! He returns my love! Perhaps you, too, have learned to feel that I am! I will no host to kiss—how can I meet his sovereign?" Saying which, the queen fell prostrate to the earth, supported by the ambassador. "Oh, my love, my love," she said when she opened her eyes. "Leave me alone now, but, oh! do not trouble me a single soul my weak confession of weakness."

"Never—never. It would be as basely to stay to oppress you with professions of love you may not return. I have caused you this unhappiness, but do not punish me. Spare me for your mercy I cannot bear. Keep this as a memorial of one who loved you, who will bless you in your every day, my last love. Farewell."

The queen gazed at the golden glove in her hand, drawing from its hands a ring, placed it on her finger, and left the pavilion. He passed the hand that adorned it to his lips and, rushing through the corridor, returned to the room. On arriving with the youthful train of the princess, the queen threw up his diplomatic engagements and quitted the town forever, but after the flight of many months returned to recover one the queen. She lived but a few years and died gazing on the picture of her heart's idol.

Of the ambassador little is known save that a week of the order of La Tegion requested when dying that a ring might be said regularly for his soul and the soul of her who possessed it by the would like grow weak.—New York News.

Office Oil.

For persistent dandruff olive oil will be found excellent.

Rub the scalp well with the oil, letting it remain on several hours, then with very hot water and a stiff brush scrub energetically the hair and brush. Rinse out all remnants in the hot water and dry.

Olive oil, being a vegetable, is used wholesomely in any quantity by the human system, which likewise is readily and in surprising quantities.

Not Blue.

It is now settled beyond all doubt that no food is more conducive of good results in the poultry yard than corn. The poultry raiser, however, who is always neglected to provide his hens at least once a day with a feed of cut bone is missing his own light and losing much eggs when they are worth good money.

In the first place our hens have a craving for food that any of the grains, and, in the second place, it increases the eggs produced in a manner equaled by no other food. In feeding, perhaps the best results may be obtained by letting the evening feed consist entirely of bone, giving the grains for each fowl and feeding grain in the morning. For growing fowls the bone supplies nearly every element needed in the food, and I find cut clover fine on it.

Hens confined now will so rapidly and evenly fatten should have one so certainly as it has us as to stop the straw vest.—Farm News.

A Few Dozen Wigwam.

The accompanying cut from The Penn and Pillow shows one of the many practical uses of a few dozen wigwam in the farm. Being only 10 inches high an immense amount of labor is saved in hoeing it. ing them and allow the wigwam to be used for hoeing loafing early in the spring or after a rain. The five wheels below make the hoed platform, the hoe being fastened to the frame in a very small space, making it very handy to and around the hens, in small barnyards or lanes. Although lighter than an ordinary wagon, it is strong enough for the heaviest loads that can be pulled by a horse.

As a change for the usual dairy corn in winter lastly any thing is comparable to sugar beets. They yield 12 to 20 tons to the acre. When fed, they cause cows to yield milk abundantly. The only trouble is that it is not much fun to dig and handle beets. They are sometimes 18 inches long and thick accordingly.

A Pennsylvania dairyman feels his cows only cottage, wheat and bran during the winter months and cowtage, potatoes and bran during the summer. He gets excellent results from this and finds the cows are utterly valueless. When fed to very high in the cold months, other dairymen ought to try his plan. They ought sometime this spring to plant a large quantity of cowtage corn. Cheap feed for cows is a most important item. The Pennsylvania dairyman also has cows all the cowtage they will eat.
