THE PENSION GHOST.

We were on our way from northern Germany to Paris, my wife and I.

The day's journey had passed so far, that the thoughts of discomfiture through the night were universal in us both, as we decided to stop at the next town, seek shelter everywhere for repose that evening, and return to Berlin and our pensioner journey in the morning.

"But where shall we sleep?" asked my wife, for our travel-weary friends in Germany had left us in the conditions of solitude in this little town.

"Perhaps the innkeeper will help us out."

Nowhere had we any surprise; the landlord mentioned our out-of-the-way ways and passed his hands of kindness and protection over the two weary travelers.

He still held us, when we reached the hotel of Frau Schmid, our pensioner.

There were several leased rooms, with the names of the respective hosts, listed across the fronts of their doors, at the entrance of the town, and the name of Frau Schmid was the greatest boast of hospitality.

There were more unfamiliar men who thought about us, with manifesting the utmost eagerness to relieve us of our fatigue.

To one of these I surrendered our bags and gave him the address, to which he should take them.

We had not far to follow him. He took us to a room in the rear, and deposited our bags upon the threshold of our lodging.

Everyone was busily employed by the proprietors of the pension, which included us if we were long located there.

When we were seated in our room, which still bore the stamp of the German origin, like evidence of a brand of legitimacy, the blinds were pulled.

There was a knock at the door. "Come in," said my wife.

"Evidently they mean no to have them here," I said.

"My wife did not answer; suddenly she closed up a small valise containing this chamber, shut her eyes, and lay down on the bed, as though dead. Her breathing became regular, and she slept like a log.

What could possible noise? But that boy was now howling loud, before her, uttering shrieks, and a wild leap, having his baggage snatched and left him.

"I am at my wits."

"They must be to have them here," I said.

My wife did not answer; suddenly she and again lay down, this time with her eyes closed. "Tranquillity," "A quiet place to live here," "a quiet place to live here," for the memory of old days.

With such thoughts a quiet repose followed, for all was quiet, save the low hum of voices and the sound of the water flowing through the window.

"How peaceful it is here," he said, "how quiet and comfortable."

"If you should ever come to Ogden again, you would find it just as quiet and comfortable," I said.

"I will never return," he said, "but I will come back again."
