This caused loud applause from the Republicans, who gathered about him allowing them to be retained in the office by the head of the department, to come upon the floor of Congress and strike at the reputation of his benefactor. He then proceeded after Robeson finished his speech the bill was passed and Whitthorne rose for a personal explanation, denying the charges made by Robeson and declaring that he was a thief and a perjurer. Robeson said only a word in reply and the subject dropped.
