SHOOTING AFFAIR BETWEEN TYPOS. The telegrams two or three days since made mention of a probably fatal shooting scrape between two printers, named Austin and Bell, working in the Times office at Council Bluffs. The Nonpareil of that city contains the full particulars of the affair. It says law, and so must we if we ever enjoy mitting a number of aliens as citizens that Austin, the person shot, was addicted to liquor, and when under its influence, was quarrelsome and insolent. On the evening of the shooting, he had an altercation with Bell, during which the latter called Austin ces of the petit jurors, they were released a liar. Austin made a rush for Bell, but until the next morning at nine o'clock, stumbled on the sidewalk; rising, he again made for Bell, who drew his revolver and eye, passing entirely through the upper portion of the brain, and lodging against the cranium, at the back part of the head. Bell was arrested; and upon an examination of Austin by medical men, they pronounced that his chances for life were as one to a thousand.
