FAULTY TIMBERING CAUSE OF DEATH

State Mine Inspector Says Better Work Must Be Done to Safeguard Miners.

J. E. Pettit, state coal mine inspector, declared in his quarterly report which was filed yesterday with Governor Egan that the faulty timbering in the coal mines in the state had been responsible for the death of several men within the last year. While inspecting the Winter Quarters mine, owned by the Utah Fuel company, he found that the superintendent was using grown timber in many places. Many 14-foot props stood in pillars and were only seven inches in diameter. The timber used in mucking-up and is not safe in the pillars.

In regard to the situation, Mr. Pettit said in his report: "The number of fatal accidents from falling roofs in this mine over the last year has been 10. The cause of these accidents was faulty timbering on the part of mine officials and particularly roof inspectors. In seeing that timbers are properly placed and the men are not allowed to work under dangerous rock or coal roofs."

"I certainly am of the opinion that greater care could be exercised in the selection of timbers for high mines, but this can be regulated by the roof inspectors."

A small fire was found in the Pleasant Valley mine, which is a relic of the fire which closed down the Utah Central mine 50 years ago. Mr. Pettit thinks that this fire is a menace to the safety of the mine and that the company should be compelled to extinguish it. He suggests a manner in which to fight it, and it will probably be done before it spreads any further, eating into the coal veins.

The ventilation in some of the Clear Creek mines owned by the Utah Fuel company are poor, and he makes several recommendations to relieve the present situation.

All the coal mines are being worked now, and the inspector says that there is no danger of a coal famine. The coal companies experience some difficulty in getting cars, but this ought not to cause any shortage that will increase the cost of coal.
