At Her Own Peril Annie O' Laughlin Rescues Her Little Brother From Instant Death.

THROWN OUT OF HARM'S REACH

Lurid Story in Chicago Tribune Seems To be a Clear Scoop on Local Papers.

Last Sunday's Chicago Tribune contains a lurid account of a most remarkable escape from instant death. the scene of which is laid at Price, Utah. The story is illustrated with a highly-colored lithograph of an onrushing train and a child lifted bodily in the air and tossed out of harm's reach after rescuing her little brother from a cruel fate. It appears to be a clear "scoop" on the local papers, and probably had its origin in the fertile brain of the Tribune's imaginative correspondent. Here is the story:

Annie O'Laughlin of Price, Utah, last week was the heroine of the most Abrilling escape from death recorded in the annals of western railroading. Biruck by an on-rushing train after rescuing her little brother, tossed high in the air, thrown ahead of the train, In the air, thrown ahead of the train, and picked up alive and practically un-injured, with the pilot of the engine touching her clothes, was the experi-ence the H-year-old girl tells. Not once during the awful ordeni did she lose consciousness, and she remem-bers vividly every sensation from the record that she leaped in front of the train and hurled her baby brother to one adde, until possible two seconds one side until, possibly two seconds later, she felt the fender touch her later, she felt the fender tonch her and the puffing, groaning monster stop just as it was about to crush the life from her frail body. And the strangest part of the thrilling tale of the child is that she declares the engine never touched her; that her body was lifted up, hurled against a billow of air, carried forward 200 feet, and then thrown, as if by the released hir pressure. In front of the slowly stopping train. Railroad men ques-tioned in regard to her statement testioned in regard to her statement tes-tify that what she says is true-that tify that what she says is true-init ahead of every engine running at 50 miles an hour is a great billow of air, that either throws a body to one side or lifts it up, and they claim that, unless a person falls and hugs the track, they cannot be carried under a track, they cannot be carried under a train that is running rapidly.

IS NOW FOND OF ENGINES.

Annie O'Laughlin's adventure is one that will be told along the Denver and Rio Grande railway for years as a railroad miracle, and the little girl already is the hereine of the line. From Denver to Sait Lake the boys on the read know of Annie O'Laughlin, and when a train rushes down the gorge at the end of which Annie lives the en-gineers and firemen wave handker-chiefs to the little girl, who stands by the door of her father's little house and waves back. Instead of being in engines and trains and enride in his engine,-the one that came near killing her. So she is happy. Anale lives a short distance from Price, in Castle valley, and her father is a prospector, with a lot of claims in the mountains and a bit of tillable land in the valley. This shear points within the mountains and a bit of tillable land in the valley. The river roars wildly in front of the house, bounding down to join the Green river in its series of glorious cases as and ruch through the gorges amid the grandest scenery in America. A little suspension bridge of wire, with two narrow boards for a footpath, crosses the stream. And to the eastward the deep shadows of the great Roan cliffs lie over the val-ley.

To the north the great Spanish Fork tak rears its noble head. And six rough the gorge, arousing the echoer f the mountains. Three go puffing nd panting, and straining toward er, and three come rushing like vind out of the mountains, down , towards the desert and the Great all lake and the trains give Annie all lake and the trains give Annie a bor friends brief, fleeting glimpses f an outside life one that Annie's other and father have told her about, astern lourists, sitting on the platforms of observation cars, might, by boking across the roaring river just as the train plunges through Diamond gorge, see a little girl, gingham clad, standing in the doorway of a whitewashed frame house, waving frantic-ally at the train. Those who do so will see the heroine of the story,

She started be-fore 7 o'clock, and left Freddy and the baby is charge of Annie. Freddy felt deserted. He howled for a time after seeing his mother disappear across the foot bridge and down the track, and he howled some more when Annie shock him and put him down in the front yard to stay until she pre-pared their breakfast. Annie was busy with the mush and did not notice her small charge. Fif-teen minutes later she ran to the door and gased out. There was Freddy, calmit todding down the railroad track towards town. He had made his way across the narrow foot bridge and started in pursuit of his mother. For one horrified instant Annie stood still. Then, with a gasp of terror, she realized that the train from Denver was due to pass at that moment. She knew because every morning she stood in the doorway and waved at it while her mother was geiting. breakfast in the doorway and waved at it while her mother was getting breakfast, Without even glancing toward the baby on the floor, Annie run toward the haby on the floor, Annie run towards the bridge, leaned upon it, and started across. Half way neross, above the foar of the waters below, she heard the rumble of the train. It was in the gorge, she was too late.

Freedy was 50 yards down the track; the engine was 400 yards away. The terror gave wings to Annie's feet. She flew down the track, and each instant the roar and crash of the onrushing train grew wilder and wilder until it dinned madness into her brain. That was the sight old Mike Connor, as if from a tunnel's mouth: a baby boy, weeping lustily, trudging down the enter of the track: a slender, fright-ened girl with hair flying and face drawn with terror, running frantically after him.
