

ONCE OPERATED IN OGDEN.
An Ex-Utah Real Estate Man in Serious
Trouble in California—Under Indictment.

Clifton E. Mayne, who operated in Ogden and some little in this city as a real estate broker during the boom, and who has brothers still engaged in the same business now, is in serious trouble in San Diego, California. A dispatch from Los Angeles to the San Francisco Chronicle says in part:

The indictment of Clifton E. Mayne for swindled lottery, by the San Diego grand jury, has caused him to be here to be booked up, with the result that a very sensational story is to be wailed. He was here only about two months, but in that short space of time he left a criminal trail behind him. It is the statements made by responsible citizens and business men may be relied upon.

Mayne was formerly a "bachelor" in Ogden, but is known to have been one of the most successful real estate dealers in that city. Beginning there as a telegrapher, he soon found his aptitude for the art at the key, so he transferred it to real estate, and became a short time ago one of the kingpins of Ogden's real estate house. In the height of his success he was reputed to be worth $2,000,000 or $3,000,000.

But Mayne was no miser. While he made money by the hundreds of thousands, finally the boom burst and Mayne found himself a poor man. After that, it is alleged, he speculated in real estate again, and again was successful. Finally he shifted to San Francisco and from thence to San Diego, where he acquired some property, but all of which is in his wife's name.

After Mayne arrived in the latter city he advertised in a small newspaper an advertisement in a daily paper of Mrs. John H. Wright's girls school, Mrs. Wright is the accomplished daughter of a prominent eastern clergyman.

Mayne arranged for her to be in charge of the two classes, while the sum total of his earnings in her training class is $1000. Miss Katherine Parsons, another girl in the school, is a short time ago one of the kingpins of Ogden's real estate house. In the height of his success he was reputed to be worth $2,000,000 or $3,000,000.

But Mayne was no miser.

While he made money by the hundreds of thousands, finally the boom burst and Mayne found himself a poor man. After that, it is alleged, he speculated in real estate again, and again was successful. Finally he shifted to San Francisco and from thence to San Diego, where he acquired some property, but all of which is in his wife's name.

After Mayne arrived in the latter city he advertised in a small newspaper an advertisement in a daily paper of Mrs. John H. Wright's girls school, Mrs. Wright is the accomplished daughter of a prominent eastern clergyman.

The girls in the classes of Mrs. Wright and Miss Parsons, of San Francisco, and they know nothing whatever about Lofton and his father's wealth, but they did believe, until within the last day or two, that Mayne was the vindictive old guard who had fostered that any earning young misses ever were blessed with. The spell is broken now, however, and they think so no longer.

It is now learned that Mayne advertised in a San Francisco paper that he desired to adopt two girls whom he would educate and make her to his great wealth. It may be inferred that he selected Mayne to make the two Sibyllic girls were the ones that were exactly to his liking.

His mother was a poor widow who had a hard struggle to support herself and family, and died not far from her home and her children.

The girls are aged 12 and 14 respectively, and are very bright and pretty. They were brought to Los Angeles by Mayne, and he remained with them for a week or ten days in a first class hotel, where their voluntary guardian had thoughtfully engaged a suit of rooms for their accommodation. In order that they might be well looked after, he engaged one of the best hotels, while that hotel had the other.

Mayne left for San Diego on Friday a week ago, telling his friends and business associates that he would be gone but a few days. He enclaved that he would be back in time to go to the races, but it would take him a day or two to act matters right. When a week had rolled around and Mayne had not returned, his creditors began to feel uneasy. Mayne's creditors came from San Diego, as he was not in the habit of telegraphing, and would have had time to prove his innocence. When it became apparent that he might go to State's prison his creditors have become alarmed, and have written to the law to lose him in his tracks. They laid the matter before the district attorney, who gave Mayne authority to act as guardian of Mayne's alleged debts until the relatives of the girls could decide what to do with him.

Summer School Notes.
