

Mayor Scott—Where are they?

Pickard (emphatically)—I gave them to you.

Mayor Scott—I have already ruled that out of order.

Pickard—I appeal from the ruling of the chair.

Folland—I can't vote intelligently on this question. It is complex, duplex and everything else that is difficult to understand. It looks like a trap has been laid by some one. Mr. Pickard has apparently been made the victim of a breach of confidence. I believe, however, that the ruling of the chair is correct.

Mayor Scott—I never have approved of the way in which the social evil has been dealt with in this city.

Quiet was restored by Councilman Hyde, moving that the matter be laid over for one week, which motion carried.

AN AFTER SEANCE.

After the adjournment Mr. Pickard created a scene by declaring that he would not go home until he had "licked" the News reporter whom he accused of having written an article militating against his official conduct.

Suddenly Mr. Pickard turned his attention toward Mayor Scott, whom he observed leaving the Council chamber, and attacked that official so vehemently that he apparently forgot to execute his threats upon the newspaper man, who was allowed to depart unharmed.

"I want to tell you, Mayor Scott, that you are a d—d shriveled up coward, the worst I have ever seen. You didn't have backbone enough to put my motion, did you?" said Pickard.

Lynn (who was standing some distance away)—Oh, shut up.

A voice—Put him out.

Pickard—Everybody knows Scott, old coward. The Council has adjourned and he can't rule me out of order now. He knows that, too, the old coward.

Mayor Scott (pacificaly)—We don't want any trouble here, Mr. Pickard. You can't get a quarrel out of me.

Pickard (gnashing his teeth and clenching his fist)—No, I can't, you miserable coward!

At this juncture Mayor Scott left the hall, followed by Pickard, who continued to characterize the Mayor as one of the most craven wretches that had ever lived.
